INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

Au printemps de 1951, la guerre froide est entrée dans sa phase la plus glaciale et la plus dangereuse. Les perspectives de guerre étaient aussi immédiates qu'effrayantes. L'apparente volonté manifestée par l'Union soviétique d'appuyer l'intervention de la Chine en Corée a convaincu les observateurs canadiens que Moscou était prête à risquer une «troisième guerre mondiale» pour atteindre ses objectifs territoriaux et stratégiques. Malgré ses efforts de réarmement, l'Alliance nord-atlantique demeurait dangereusement faible. L'Armée rouge, selon les estimations des fonctionnaires canadiens, était en mesure d'«occuper l'Europe de l'Ouest jusqu'aux Pyrénées en trois mois». Une avance communiste contre l'ensemble de l'Asie du Sud-Est — en passant par l'Indochine, la Birmanie, la Malaisie et l'Indonésie jusqu'en Inde et au Pakistan — était considérée une «possibilité imminente». La Perse (l'Iran) et le Moyen-Orient étaient également menacés. «Bref, avertissait un mémoire au Cabinet en décembre 1950, les récents succès des communistes mettent à jour la sombre possibilité qu'au cours d'une guerre généralisée ou encore à la suite d'une attrition à la pièce, l'ensemble de l'Asie et de l'Europe, exception faite du Royaume-Uni, de l'Espagne et du Portugal, ne tombe rapidement sous la domination soviétique»[1]. Inévitablement, ces circonstances ont eu de profondes répercussions sur la politique étrangère du Canada en 1951. Elles ont étayé le désir d'Ottawa de tempérer le comportement des Américains en Asie tout en incitant le Canada à déployer davantage d'efforts pour prévenir la guerre en Europe de l'Ouest et dans l'Atlantique Nord.

Au début de l'année, Ottawa portait une attention particulière à la crise en Corée, où la détermination croissante de Washington de voir les Nations unies qualifier la Chine d'agresseur menaçait de transformer une action policière restreinte en une guerre tous azimuts. Lester B. Pearson, secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, retourna à New York au début de janvier et redoubla d'efforts pour qu'intervienne un cessez-le-feu entre la Chine et les Nations unies (documents 19 à 78). Par ailleurs, le premier ministre Louis Saint-Laurent, qui rencontrait à Londres ses collègues du Commonwealth, mit les bouchées doubles pour garantir que l'Inde et ses amis non alignés continuent d'appuyer l'Occident au cas où il s'avérerait impossible de négocier une trêve (documents 525 à 540). Ces documents, qui témoignent des sentiments d'urgence et d'inquiétude qui ont saisi les décideurs canadiens au cours des quelques premiers mois de l'année, nous donnent un aperçu aussi rare que fascinant de la poursuite par Saint-Laurent et Pearson d'objectifs diplomatiques semblables de part et d'autre de l'Atlantique.

Pourtant, ces efforts auront finalement été vains. L'Assemblée générale des Nations unies a approuvé, au début de février 1951, une résolution américaine qui qualifiait la Chine d'agresseur. Ce geste, qui aura eu pour effet d'exclure la Chine de l'organisation internationale durant deux décennies, allait mettre à l'épreuve l'ingéniosité des générations successives de décideurs canadiens dans leur quête de moyens toujours plus subtils pour sortir la Chine de son isolement (document 949). Bien que le Canada ait appuyé la résolution des Nations unies, il l'a fait à

INTRODUCTION

In the spring of 1951, the Cold War entered its chilliest and most dangerous phase yet. The prospects of war were immediate and frightening. The Soviet Union's apparent willingness to support China's intervention in Korea convinced Canadian observers that Moscow was willing to risk a "third world war" to achieve its territorial and strategic objectives. The North Atlantic alliance, despite its efforts to rearm, remained dangerously weak. The Red Army, Canadian officials estimated, could "occupy Western Europe to the Pyrenees in three months." A Communist advance against the whole of Southeast Asia — sweeping through Indo-China, Burma, Malaya and Indonesia all the way to India and Pakistan — was considered "an early possibility." Persia (Iran) and the Middle East were also threatened. "In short," warned a December 1950 memorandum to Cabinet, "recent Communist successes disclose the stark possibility that, either in the course of a general war or as a result of piece-meal attrition, the whole of Asia and Europe, apart from the United Kingdom, Spain and Portugal, might fall rapidly under Soviet domination."[1] Inevitably, these circumstances had a profound impact on Canadian foreign policy in 1951. They reinforced Ottawa's desire to moderate American behaviour in Asia, while simultaneously spurring Canada to greater efforts to deter war in Western Europe and the North Atlantic.

As the new year began, Ottawa's attention was firmly fixed on the crisis in Korea, where Washington's growing determination to have the United Nations declare China an aggressor threatened to transform a limited police action into a full-scale war. Lester B. Pearson, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, returned to New York in early January and redoubled his earlier efforts to broker a cease-fire between China and the United Nations (Documents 19 to 78). At the same time, the Prime Minister, Louis St. Laurent, who was meeting in London with his Commonwealth colleagues, tried hard to ensure that India and its non-aligned friends would continue to support the West should a truce prove impossible to arrange (Documents 525 to 540). These documents, which reflect the urgency and concern that gripped Canadian policy-makers during the first few months of the year, provide a rare and fascinating glimpse of St. Laurent and Pearson pursuing similar diplomatic objectives from different sides of the Atlantic.

Their efforts, however, were ultimately in vain. The United Nations General Assembly approved an American-sponsored resolution in early February 1951 that branded China an aggressor. This action, which effectively excluded China from the international organization for two decades, would tax the ingenuity of successive generations of Canadian policy-makers as they searched for evermore subtle ways to break down China's isolation (Document 949). Although Canada supported the United States' resolution, it did so only reluctantly. "Emotionalism has become the basis of [American] policy,"[2] complained Pearson, who turned to Hume Wrong, his friend and Canada's long-serving Ambassador to Washington, for assurance about American foreign policy (Document 81). Unsatisfied with Wrong's contrecœur. «L'émotivité est devenue le fondement de la politique [américaine]»[2], s'est plaint Pearson, qui se tourna vers Hume Wrong, ami et ambassadeur canadien de longue date à Washington, pour faire le point sur la politique étrangère américaine (document 81). Insatisfait de la réponse judicieuse de Wrong (document 85), Pearson demanda au ministère des Affaires extérieures d'examiner l'ensemble des relations du Canada avec les États-Unis. Bien que cette étude n'ait jamais été menée à terme et que les documents de référence soient trop longs et nombreux pour être publiés ici, elle a néanmoins débouché sur une conclusion digne de mention. Dans un discours maintes fois cité, prononcé devant une réunion mixte des clubs Empire et Canadian à Toronto le 10 avril, Pearson a reconnu que «le temps des relations politiques relativement faciles et automatiques avec notre voisin est, à mon avis, révolu»[3].

Cette remarque valait particulièrement dans le cas des relations de défense entre les deux pays. Bien que les liens se soient resserrés et élargis en 1951, la gestion de ces relations est devenue de plus en plus difficile. L'espace aérien canadien a été graduellement intégré au cours de l'année dans un programme officieux mais très réel de défense conjointe de l'Amérique du Nord. Au début de janvier, le Cabinet a approuvé des plans pour étendre radicalement le réseau de radar qui allait fonder la défense de l'Amérique du Nord (documents 651 à 675). Par la suite, les deux pays ont convenu de permettre aux vols d'interception de faire fi des frontières nationales lors de la poursuite d'aéronefs intrus (documents 753) et de renforcer automatiquement leur aviation mutuelle en cas d'hostilités (documents 754). Le ministère des Affaires extérieures et le Comité des chefs d'état-major ont commencé peu à peu à évaluer les implications de la nomination d'un officier canadien pour aider le commandant américain chargé de la défense des régions orientales de l'Amérique du Nord, là où la démarche d'intégration était la plus avancée (documents 747 à 751). Ces questions complexes de commandement et de contrôle ont ouvert une nouvelle ère dans les relations de défense bilatérale, qui a atteint son point culminant lors de la création du Commandement de la défense aérospatiale de l'Amérique du Nord, en 1957.

Les États-Unis voulaient cependant davantage que la simple coopération du Canada dans la défense de l'Amérique du Nord; ils cherchaient aussi à garantir leur accès aux bases et aux installations dans le Nord du Canada. L'accroissement de la présence militaire américaine au Canada était une question qui avait inquiété périodiquement les gouvernements libéraux depuis le milieu de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. En 1951, les Américains avaient demandé un bail à long terme à Torbay (Terre-Neuve), ce qui avait eu pour effet de placer la question devant le Cabinet. J.W. Pickersgill, adjoint spécial du premier ministre, et Brooke Claxton, ministre de la Défense nationale et personnage de plus en plus influent sur la scène de la politique étrangère à Ottawa, avaient insisté pour que le Canada ne concède plus de baux à long terme aux États-Unis (documents 714 à 746). On ne savait toujours pas report (Document 85), Pearson asked the Department of External Affairs to examine in general Canada's relations with the United States. Although this study was never completed, and its background papers proved too long and numerous for publication here, it led to a noteworthy conclusion. In an oft-cited speech delivered to a joint meeting of the Empire and Canadian Clubs in Toronto on 10 April 1951, Pearson acknowledged that "the days of relatively easy and automatic political relations with our neighbour are, I think, over."[3]

This was particularly true of defence relations between the two countries. Even as these ties grew closer and more extensive during 1951, managing them became increasingly difficult. Canadian airspace was gradually incorporated during the year into an informal, but very real, program for the joint defence of North America. In early January, Cabinet approved plans to extend dramatically the radar system on which the defence of North America was eventually erected (Documents 651 to 675). Subsequently, the two countries agreed to allow interceptor flights to disregard national borders when pursuing airborne intruders (Document 753) and to reinforce automatically each other's air force in the event of hostilities (Document 754). The Department of External Affairs and the Chiefs of Staff Committee began slowly to wrestle with the implications of appointing a Canadian officer to assist the American commander responsible for defending the eastern portions of North America, where the process of integration was most advanced (Documents 747 to 751). These complicated issues of command and control ushered in a new era in bilateral defence relations, culminating in the establishment of the North American Air Defence Command in 1957.

The United States, however, wanted more than just Canada's cooperation in the defence of North America; it also wanted secure access to bases and facilities in the Canadian north. The growing American military presence in Canada was an issue that had worried Liberal governments intermittently since the middle of the Second World War. In 1951, an American request for a long-term lease at Torbay, Newfoundland again placed the question before Cabinet. J.W. Pickersgill, the Prime Minister's special assistant, and Brooke Claxton, the Minister of National Defence and an increasingly important influence on foreign policy, insisted that Canada no longer grant long-term leases to the United States (documents 714 to 746). It remained unclear at the end of the year how the two countries would deal with the continuing American requirement for bases in Canada.

Finding ways to exert Canada's sovereign rights in other contexts was even more difficult. The American request for a "canopy agreement" that would allow the United States to import and store nuclear weapons at Goose Bay continued to raise disturbing questions about Canada's role and responsibilities in American nuclear strategy and involved the two countries in a series of lengthy discussions (Documents 682 to 713). For a while, they experimented with an ad hoc arrangement under which the United States kept Canada abreast of those international developments that might eventually prompt it to employ nuclear weapons. In exchange, the Canadian government promised to meet any American request for à la fin de l'année comment les deux pays allaient aborder la question des bases que les Américains continuaient d'exiger au Canada.

Or, il était encore plus difficile de trouver des moyens d'exercer les droits souverains du Canada dans d'autres contextes. Les Américains continuaient de demander un «accord parapluie» qui permettrait aux États-Unis d'importer et d'entreposer des armes nucléaires à Goose Bay. Cette demande a eu pour effet de soulever des questions troublantes au sujet du rôle et des responsabilités du Canada dans le cadre de la stratégie nucléaire américaine et d'engager les deux pays dans une série de longues discussions (documents 682 à 713). Pendant quelque temps, les deux pays ont tenté de s'en remettre à une entente spéciale en vertu de laquelle les États-Unis tenaient le Canada au courant des événements internationaux qui pourraient les inciter à avoir recours aux armes nucléaires. En échange, le gouvernement canadien promettait de répondre sans tarder aux demandes d'installations formulées par les Américains (documents 697 et 699). Cet arrangement s'est rapidement révélé insatisfaisant; il ne répondait ni aux besoins de libre accès des Américains à leurs bases au Canada ni au désir d'Ottawa d'être consulté au sujet d'une utilisation de son territoire si lourde de conséquences. À la fin de l'année, les deux pays continuaient (et ils allaient le faire jusqu'au milieu des années 1960) à se débattre avec ce dilemme.

L'importance des questions de défense dans la politique étrangère du Canada en 1951 explique l'attention qu'accorde ce volume aux activités du Canada au sein de l'Alliance de l'Atlantique Nord. Tout au long de l'année, le processus de réorganisation amorcé en 1950 s'est accéléré. La décision de l'OTAN, à la fin de 1950, de poster une force intégrée en Europe a créé une foule de problèmes juridiques et organisationnels pour l'alliance (documents 414 à 453), dont la question éternelle de la répartition des frais n'était pas le moindre (documents 436 à 440). Dans le même ordre d'idées, ce volume aborde les problèmes de procédure auxquels a eu à faire face le Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord réorganisé (document 435) pour déterminer avec précision ce que signifiait la consultation entre les alliés (documents 429 à 434). En plus de suivre la réaction du Canada aux inquiétudes de ce type soulevées au sein de l'alliance, le volume documente également les considérations politiques, financières et juridiques qu'ont soulevées la décision prise par le Canada d'envoyer la 27e brigade d'infanterie en Allemagne (documents 393 à 428).

Qui plus est, le chapitre sur les affaires de l'Atlantique Nord traite de l'évolution de la politique de défense et d'aide mutuelle du Canada lorsque le Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord a prié ses membres de déployer plus d'efforts pour combler le fossé entre les ressources de l'alliance et ses obligations militaires (documents 352 à 392). Il n'est pas surprenant que l'intense campagne de réarmement ait incité certains États membres à remettre en question les buts et le sens de l'alliance. Les États-Unis ont proposé que le Conseil de l'Atlantique Nord examine les moyens que pourraient prendre les alliés pour en arriver au type de coopération non militaire envisagé dans le deuxième article du traité. L'initiative américaine a offert l'occasion aux fonctionnaires canadiens de débattre le bien-fondé d'une coopération nord-atlantique plus étroite dans un échange de lettres et de notes qui exprimaient, dans l'ensemble, un certain scepticisme quant à la valeur de l'article II (documents 477 à 484). Leurs soupçons n'étaient pas sans fondement. Au moment où facilities with alacrity (Documents 697 and 699). This arrangement quickly proved unsatisfactory; it met neither Washington's need for unfettered access to its bases in Canada nor Ottawa's wish to be consulted about such consequential use of its territory. As the year ended, the two countries continued — and they would do so until the mid-1960s — to wrestle with this dilemma.

The importance of defence questions in Canadian foreign policy in 1951 accounts for the attention this volume accords Canada's activities in the North Atlantic alliance. Throughout the year, the process of reorganization that was started in 1950 gathered speed. NATO's decision in late 1950 to station an integrated force in Europe created a host of legal and organizational problems for the alliance (Documents 414 to 453), not least among them the perennial question of who paid for what (documents 436 to 440). In the same vein, this volume devotes some space to the procedural problems that the re-organized North Atlantic Council (Document 435) addressed as it tried to determine exactly what inter-allied consultation meant (Documents 429 to 434). In addition to tracing Canada's response to these kinds of alliance-wide concerns, the volume also documents the political, financial and legal considerations that arose from Canada's decision to despatch the 27th Infantry Brigade Group to Germany (Documents 393 to 428).

More important, the chapter on North Atlantic affairs examines the evolution of Canadian defence and mutual aid policy as the North Atlantic Council urged its members to step up their efforts to close the gap between the alliance's resources and its military requirements (Documents 352 to 392). Not surprisingly, the arduous rearmament campaign prompted some member states to revisit the purposes and meaning of the alliance. The United States suggested that the North Atlantic Council investigate how the allies could achieve the kind of non-military cooperation envisaged in the treaty's second article. The American initiative provided an opportunity for Canadian officials to debate the merits of closer North Atlantic cooperation in an exchange of letters and memoranda which were, for the most part, sceptical of Article II's value (Documents 477 to 484). Their suspicions were not misplaced. At the same time as the council asked Pearson to chair a committee to study closer inter-allied economic and political cooperation (Documents 476 and 485 to 491), it established a new mechanism to coordinate alliance activities. Composed of Britain, France and the United States, the new Temporary Council Committee acted as a kind of 'star chamber' which assessed each member's contribution to the alliance (Documents 492 to 504). This experiment in co-ordinating economic and military resources was hardly popular in Ottawa.

Cold War considerations influenced almost every aspect of Canadian external relations in 1951. For instance, despite the fiscal restraint program imposed as a result of the war in Korea, new posts were opened in Portugal — to consolidate relations with a NATO ally (Documents 12 to 14) — and in Finland — to strengthen the Baltic republic's fragile independence vis-à-vis the Soviet Union (Documents 7 to 11). Similarly, a peace treaty with Japan was concluded (Documents 950 to 968), and the postwar settlement with Italy revised (Documents 897 to 902), in a manner designed to please these new Cold War allies. Old friendships assumed new significance in the tense bipolar context, as the documents on the sale of Canadian wheat to Norway attest (Documents 903 to 908).

le conseil demandait à Pearson de présider un comité pour étudier le resserrement de la coopération économique et politique entre les alliés (documents 476 et 485 à 491), il mettait en place un nouveau mécanisme pour coordonner les activités de l'alliance. Composé de la Grande-Bretagne, de la France et des États-Unis, le nouveau Comité du conseil temporaire agissait un peu à la façon d'une «chambre étoilée» pour évaluer la contribution de chaque membre à l'alliance (documents 494 à 504). Cette expérience de coordination des ressources économiques et militaires était loin d'être populaire à Ottawa.

En 1951, l'ombre de la guerre froide planait sur presque chaque dimension des relations extérieures du Canada. Par exemple, malgré le programme de restriction financière imposé dans la foulée de la guerre de Corée, de nouvelles missions ont été ouvertes au Portugal — pour consolider les relations avec un allié de l'OTAN (documents 12 à 14) — et en Finlande — pour renforcer la fragile indépendance de cette république balte face à l'Union soviétique (documents 7 à 11). Dans le même ordre d'idées, un traité de paix a été conclu avec le Japon (documents 950 à 968) et le règlement d'après-guerre avec l'Italie a été révisé (documents 897 à 902) de façon à donner satisfaction à ces nouveaux alliés de la guerre froide. Les anciennes amitiés ont acquis un nouveau sens dans ce contexte bipolaire tendu, comme l'attestent les documents sur la vente de blé canadien à la Norvège (documents 903 à 908).

La lutte entre le Bloc soviétique et les États-Unis et leurs alliés a également influé sur la situation économique internationale. Les problèmes suscités par l'expansion du marché mondial de l'or, par exemple, ont affecté les relations du Canada avec le Fonds monétaire international (documents 294 à 296). D'une manière plus significative, Ottawa a été mêlé de près au travail de la nouvelle Conférence internationale sur les produits de base, qui cherchait à répartir de façon équitable des matières premières rares entre les pays occidentaux et non alignés (documents 298 à 337). En plus de veiller à ce que les alliés jouissent de suffisamment de ressources pour se réarmer, le Canada a continué de limiter le commerce avec le Bloc soviétique (documents 864 et 865) et la Chine (documents 946 à 948). Naturellement, les thèmes de la guerre froide dominent le chapitre qui porte directement sur l'Union soviétique et l'Europe de l'Est (chapitre 9). Ce volume documente particulièrement le souci du gouvernement d'anticiper la politique étrangère de Moscou (documents 924 à 926) et se penche sur les tentatives soutenues du Canada de livrer une guerre psychologique en Europe de l'Est (documents 938 et 939).

La fin de l'année a amené une légère baisse des tensions est-ouest. Au début de juillet, une initiative soviétique a encouragé les États-Unis et la Chine à amorcer le difficile processus de négociation d'un cessez-le-feu en Corée. Le Canada n'a pas été partie prenante à toutes les dimensions des négociations et ce volume ne tente pas de rendre compte de l'ensemble de ces discussions. Il met plutôt l'accent sur les événements d'un intérêt particulier pour le Canada. Par conséquent, une bonne part des documents sur cette question font état des efforts de Pearson en vue de modérer le langage que Washington souhaitait utiliser pour avertir Pékin des conséquences de toute violation d'une trêve (documents 155 à 179). Lors de la 6e assemblée générale des Nations unies, la réduction des tensions internationales s'est traduite dans la décision de l'assemblée de réunir la Commission de l'énergie atomique de International economic conditions were also shaped by the struggle between the Soviet Bloc and the United States and its allies. The problems created by the expanding global market for gold, for example, affected Canada's relations with the International Monetary Fund (Documents 294 to 296). More significantly, Ottawa found itself deeply embroiled in the work of the new International Commodity Conference, which sought to distribute scarce raw materials among the western and non-aligned countries in an equitable fashion (Documents 298 to 337). In addition to helping ensure that its allies had sufficient resources to rearm, Canada continued to restrict trade with the Soviet Bloc (Documents 864 and 865) and China (Documents 946 to 948). Naturally, Cold War themes dominate the chapter which deals directly with the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe (Chapter 9). In particular, this volume documents the government's preoccupation with anticipating Moscow's foreign policy (Documents 924 to 926) and explores Ottawa's continuing efforts to wage psychological warfare in Eastern Europe (Documents 938 and 939).

The end of the year brought about a slight relaxation of East-West tensions. In early July, a Soviet initiative encouraged the United States and China to begin the difficult process of negotiating a cease-fire in Korea. Canada was not closely involved in every aspect of the negotiations and this volume does not try to account for the entire course of these discussions. Instead, it focuses on those developments that were of particular interest to Canada. Consequently, much of the material on this subject documents Pearson's efforts to moderate the language Washington wished to use to warn Peking of the consequences of breaching a truce (Documents 155 to 179). At the United Nations' Sixth General Assembly the reduction in international tension was evident in the Assembly's decision to combine the U.N. Atomic Energy Commission with the Commission for Conventional Armaments into a single agency (Documents 206 to 216). The new Disarmament Commission was expected to re-start stalled disarmament negotiations in 1952.

The attention accorded Cold War divisions and the money spent on rearmament left a growing number of states unimpressed. In 1951 signs of a "serious rift" appeared in the West's relations with the less developed world.[4] Like the Cold War, with which it would become inextricably linked, the division between rich and poor was destined to become a permanent feature of international relations in the second half of the twentieth century. As indigenous nationalism and pressure for decolonization grew apace in Asia and Africa, Canada was forced to navigate between its traditional allies and its newer Asian and African friends. This conflict is documented in Ottawa's response to Britain's confrontation with Egypt (Documents 909 to 915) and in its moderate approach to South Africa's dispute with India and its non-aligned friends over the status of South-West Africa (Documents 217 to 230).

The emerging division between rich and poor is also apparent in the documentation reproduced in this volume on the debate surrounding the proposal that the United Nations establish a special fund to aid the less developed countries (Document 232 to 240). Canadian officials, overwhelmed by demands for assistance from l'ONU ainsi que la Commission des armements de type classique en un seul organisme (documents 206 à 216). On s'attendait à ce que la nouvelle Commission du désarmement relance en 1952 les négociations sur le désarmement, qui avaient été interrompues.

L'attention accordée aux divisions suscitées par la guerre froide et l'argent consacré au réarmement laissaient de plus en plus d'États sceptiques. En 1951, on a constaté l'apparition d'un «profond désaccord» dans les relations entre l'Occident et le monde en développement[4]. À l'instar de la guerre froide, à laquelle il allait être inextricablement lié, le fossé entre les riches et les pauvres allait devenir une caractéristique permanente des relations internationales au cours de la deuxième moitié du XX^{e} siècle. Étant donné la rapide croissance du nationalisme autochtone et des pressions en faveur de la décolonisation en Asie et en Afrique, le Canada a dû manœuvrer entre ses alliés traditionnels et ses nouveaux amis asiatiques et africains. Ce conflit est documenté dans la réaction d'Ottawa à la confrontation entre la Grande-Bretagne et l'Égypte (documents 909 à 915), et dans son approche modérée à l'égard du différend entre l'Afrique du Sud et l'Inde et ses amis non alignés portant sur le statut de la Namibie (documents 217 à 230).

La division croissante entre les riches et les pauvres ressort également de la documentation reproduite dans ce volume et portant sur le débat entourant la proposition à l'effet que les Nations unies constituent un fonds spécial pour aider les pays en développement (documents 232 à 240). Les fonctionnaires canadiens, submergés par les demandes d'aide des bénéficiaires du plan Colombo (documents 543 à 586) et d'une variété d'organismes des Nations unies (chapitre 4), se sont empressés de définir une politique cohérente d'aide à l'étranger (documents 273 et 274). Ils en avaient surtout contre ce qu'ils considéraient comme une critique «irresponsable» adressée au Canada et à ses alliés occidentaux par les représentants du monde en développement (documents 241 à 243).

Les relations personnelles, politiques et bureaucratiques qui avaient façonné la politique canadienne en 1950 demeuraient essentiellement les mêmes. Au sommet, le premier ministre Saint-Laurent continuait d'effectuer un travail en douceur avec Pearson, son secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures de plus en plus habile et confiant. Arnold Heeney continuait d'agir comme sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures. Charles Ritchie, H.O. Moran et Léon Mayrand étaient les trois sous-secrétaires adjoints du ministère.

Les mêmes titulaires dirigeaient toujours les missions les plus importantes du Canada : Hume Wrong était encore à Washington, Dana Wilgress à Londres et Georges Vanier à Paris. Il n'y a eu qu'un changement d'importance au sein des représentants du Canada à l'étranger. R.G. Riddell, qui avait été nommé représentant permanent aux Nations unies en août 1950, est décédé subitement en mars 1951 et a été remplacé par John Holmes à titre intérimaire. David M. Johnson est rentré du Pakistan pour occuper ce poste de façon permanente en novembre 1951.

Colombo Plan recipients (Documents 543 to 586) and from a variety of United Nations' agencies (Chapter 4), scrambled to define a coherent foreign aid policy (Documents 273 and 274). Most deeply resented what they considered to be "irresponsible" criticism levelled at Canada and its Western allies by representatives of the developing world (Documents 241 to 243).

The personal, political and bureaucratic relationships that had shaped Canadian policy in 1950 remained largely unaltered. At the top, the Prime Minister, St. Laurent, continued to work smoothly with his increasingly sure-footed and self-confident Secretary of State for External Affairs, Pearson. Arnold Heeney continued to serve as the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs. Charles Ritchie, H.O. Moran and Léon Mayrand served as the department's three assistant under-secretaries.

There were no changes in leadership at Canada's most important posts: Hume Wrong remained in Washington, Dana Wilgress in London, and Georges Vanier in Paris. There was only one significant change among Canada's representatives abroad. R.G. Riddell, who became the Permanent Representative to the United Nations in August 1950, died suddenly in March 1951 and was replaced by John Holmes in an acting capacity. David M. Johnson returned from Pakistan to take over the post on a permanent basis in November 1951.

This survey of Canadian foreign policy is drawn primarily from the records of the Department of External Affairs and the Privy Council Office. These sources were supplemented where necessary by the personal papers of many of the Cabinet ministers and senior officials involved in these events and by the records of the Departments of Defence, Trade and Commerce, Fisheries and Finance. In preparing this volume, I was given complete access to the records of the Department of External Affairs and generous access to other collections. A complete list of the sources examined in the preparation of this volume may be found on page xxvii.

The selection of documents has been guided by the principles set out in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi) of this series. The editorial devices used in this volume are those described in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. xix). A dagger (†) indicates a document that has not been printed and ellipses (...) an editorial excision.

The work on this volume had already begun when I became its editor in the fall of 1992. I am grateful for the early start made on this project by Gaston Blanchet. The staff at the National Archives of Canada was instrumental in bringing this project to completion. Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden and Dave Smith of the Military and International Affairs Records Unit of the Government Archives Division responded promptly, helpfully and, most important, cheerfully to my many inquiries. Michael Way, from the Access to Information Section, and Janet Murray and Michel Poitras at the circulation desk, worked hard at keeping a steady supply of raw material flowing across my desk.

Christopher Cook and Brian Hearnden served ably as research assistants throughout the enterprise. My colleague Ted Kelly, who helped edit the chapters on the conduct of diplomacy and relations with the Soviet bloc, provided indispensable assistance at all stages of the project. Angie Sauer helped with the selection of Ce survol de la politique étrangère du Canada s'appuie avant tout sur les dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et du Bureau du Conseil privé. Au besoin, nous avons aussi consulté les documents personnels de nombreux ministres du Cabinet et hauts fonctionnaires qui ont participé à ces événements ainsi que les dossiers des ministères de la Défense, du Commerce, des Pêches et des Finances. Pour préparer ce volume, j'ai joui d'un accès complet aux dossiers du ministère des Affaires extérieures et d'un accès généreux à d'autres collections. On trouvera à la page xxvii une liste complète des sources consultées pour préparer ce volume.

Le choix des documents a été régi par les principes énoncés dans l'introduction du volume 7 (pp. ix-xi) de cette série. Les outils rédactionnels utilisés dans ce volume sont les mêmes que ceux décrits dans l'introduction du volume 9 (p. xix). La croix (†) indique un document inédit et les points de suspension (...) un passage supprimé.

Les travaux portant sur ce volume avaient déjà débuté lorsqu'on m'a chargé de sa rédaction à l'automne 1992. Je remercie Gaston Blanchet d'avoir si bien lancé le projet. Le personnel des Archives nationales du Canada nous a aidés à le mener à terme. Paulette Dozois, Paul Marsden et Dave Smith des sections des Archives militaires et des Affaires internationales de la Division des archives gouvernementales ont répondu avec empressement et, surtout, avec entrain à mes nombreuses demandes. Michael Way, de la section de l'Information, et Janet Murray et Michel Poitras, du bureau du prêt, ont tout mis en œuvre pour m'alimenter en documents.

Christopher Cook et Brian Hearnden m'ont fait profiter de leurs compétences à titre d'adjoints à la recherche tout au long du projet. Mon collègue Ted Kelly, qui a participé à la révision des chapitres sur la diplomatie et les relations avec le Bloc soviétique, m'a fourni une aide indispensable à toutes les étapes du projet. Angie Sauer m'a aidé à choisir les documents sur l'Allemagne, tandis que Robert Bothwell a partagé avec moi ses connaissances de l'énergie atomique. Norman Hillmer, Hector Mackenzie et Don Barry, anciens directeurs de rédaction, ont toujours consenti à m'aider et leurs conseils se sont toujours avérés pertinents et pratiques. Le rédacteur en chef de cette série, John Hilliker, a relu le manuscrit aussi attentivement qu'à l'habitude. Ses commentaires ont sans doute amélioré le texte. La publication de cette série n'aurait pas été possible sans l'appui que j'ai reçu des deux directeurs de la Direction des communications ministérielles sous lesquels elle a pris son envol — Mary Jane Starr et Alan Darisse. Je demeure le seul responsable du choix final des documents présentés dans ce volume.

La section historique poursuit sa nouvelle pratique de fournir le texte supplémentaire et de coordonner la préparation technique du volume. Le manuscrit a été dactylographié et mis en page par Aline Gélineau. Gabrielle Nishiguchi a trouvé la plupart des photographies présentées dans ce volume. Gayle Fraser, de l'Institut canadien des affaires internationales, a gentiment fourni la photo de John Holmes et Trygve Lie. Boris Stipernitz a compilé l'index et repéré une foule d'erreurs typographiques. Le service de traduction du Ministère a traduit en français les notes en bas de page, les légendes et le texte auxiliaire. Notre collègue de la Direction des communications ministérielles, Francine Fournier, nous a généreusement aidé à peaufiner le texte français. Alan Bowker et Saul Grey, de la Direction générale de documents on Germany, and Robert Bothwell willingly contributed his knowledge on atomic energy. Former editors Norman Hillmer, Hector Mackenzie and Don Barry were always ready to help and invariably offered sound and practical advice. The general editor of this series, John Hilliker, reviewed the entire manuscript with his usual attention to detail. His comments undoubtedly have made this a better book. The series would not be possible without the support I received from the two directors of the Corporate Communications Division under whom it prospered - Mary Jane Starr and Alan Darisse. I remain solely responsible for the final selection of documents in this volume.

The Historical Section continues its new practice of furnishing the supplementary text and co-ordinating the technical preparation of the volume. The manuscript was typed and formatted by Aline Gélineau. Gabrielle Nishiguchi located most of the photographs in this volume. Gayle Fraser of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs helpfully supplied the picture of John Holmes and Trygve Lie. Boris Stipernitz compiled the index and skilfully caught a number of typographical errors. The department's translation bureau rendered into French the footnotes, captions and ancillary text. Our colleagues in the Corporate Communications Division, Francine Fournier and Nancy Sample, graciously provided us with editorial advice. Alan Bowker and Saul Grey of the department's Access to Information Office helped secure the release of material on the United States Strategic Air Command from the United States Department of State. Marlène Picard declassified the documents on Herbert Norman. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin, who proofread the entire manuscript and composed the list of persons generously shared the insights garnered from her work on several earlier volumes. Mary and Katherine Donaghy put up with the domestic distractions caused by my editorial work with cheerful goodwill.

Marlène Picard a déclassifié les documents sur Herbert Norman. Gail Kirkpatrick Devlin, qui a lu les épreuves de l'ensemble du manuscrit et composé la liste des personnes, nous a généreusement fait profiter de l'expérience acquise à l'occasion de l'édition de plusieurs volumes antérieurs. Mary et Katherine Donaghy ont accepté de bon cœur les distractions causées au sein du foyer par mon travail de rédaction.

Le premier ministre du Royaume-Uni
au premier ministre

Prime Minister of United Kingdom to Prime Minister

London, February 5, 1951

My dear Prime Minister,

When the question of the accreditation of High Commissioners was discussed at the meeting of Commonwealth Prime Ministers in 1948 it was agreed that High Commissioners should not be accredited to or by The King but that the question of providing some form of credentials for them should be considered.

Since then, as you know, this question was raised at the end of 1949 by Mr. Nehru in the light of certain assurances which he had given, when India's position as a Republic within the Commonwealth was under consideration in India, that Indian representatives abroad would in each case be accredited by the President of the Indian Republic to the Head of the State concerned. Following discussions between the United Kingdom and Indian Governments, of which other Commonwealth Governments were duly informed at the time, it was agreed that the United Kingdom High Commissioner in Delhi and the Indian High Commissioner in London should be given Letters of Commission signed by The King and the President respectively.

In these circumstances, I think you will agree that the time has come for Commonwealth Governments other than India to consider the adoption of some form of intergovernmental accreditation for High Commissioners exchanged between themselves. Subject to the views of other Commonwealth Governments, it seems to me that the most appropriate procedure would be for such High Commissioners to be provided with a letter from their Prime Minister to the Prime Minister of the country to which they are appointed. This is the procedure actually followed by the Union Government in the case of their High Commissioners, and I suggest that it should be adopted, or in the case of South Africa continued, in all future appointments of this kind.

I am writing in similar terms to the Prime Ministers of all the other Members of the Commonwealth except India, and I am sending copies of my letters to the respective Commonwealth High Commissioners in London.[1]

Yours sincerely,
C.R. ATTLEE

Le premier ministre
au premier ministre du Royaume-Uni

Prime Minister to Prime Minister of United Kingdom

Ottawa, March 14, 1951

My dear Prime Minister,

I was glad to receive your letter of February 5 relative to the accreditation of High Commissioners. You will be interested to know that it has for some time been our practice to provide Canadian High Commissioners with letters of introduction from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to his opposite number in the respective Commonwealth capitals — i.e. to the Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations in London and to the Minister for External Affairs or for Commonwealth Relations in other Commonwealth countries.

The practice of Commonwealth governments varies with respect to appointments to Ottawa; the High Commissioner for Australia who arrived in 1947, like his United Kingdom colleague who arrived the previous year, bore no letter of accreditation, the High Commissioner for New Zealand who arrived in August 1950 and the most recent High Commissioner for India who arrived in August, 1949, carried letters of introduction from their respective Ministers of External Affairs, and the High Commissioners for Pakistan and South Africa, both of whom came in the middle of 1949, carried letters of introduction from Prime Minister to Prime Minister.

I share what I believe to be your view that it is desirable to achieve so far as possible uniformity between Commonwealth nations with respect to accreditation and the designation of representatives exchanged between them. Consequently I welcome your proposal to consider the adoption of some form of intergovernmental accreditation for High Commissioners.

We have felt that personal letters of introduction from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to his corresponding colleague in other Commonwealth governments is in keeping with the informal and friendly relationship which exists within the Commonwealth. At the same time we see no objection in principle to such communications from Prime Minister to Prime Minister. However, if a change is to be made affecting a number of Commonwealth nations and if we are to explore the possibility of uniformity of accreditation, it occurs to me that it would be advisable to examine the desirability of general adoption of the form of accreditation initiated last year between the United Kingdom and India. It is clear that the wording of a Commission accrediting a High Commissioner from one Commonwealth country to another, in cases where India is not involved, must be worded differently to the Commissions used by the United Kingdom and Indian High Commissioners in New Delhi and London respectively.

I should be interested to learn from you of the nature of the replies received from other Commonwealth Prime Ministers and trust that these will indicate that a basic uniformity can be established in respect of this matter of accreditation.

Yours sincerely,

L.S. ST. LAURENT

Le premier ministre du Royaume-Uni au premier ministre[2]

London, June 30, 1951

My dear Prime Minister

Would you refer to your letter of the 14th March about the suggestion that in future High Commissioners exchanged between Members of the Commonwealth other than India should be accredited by a letter from their Prime Minister to the Prime Minister of the country to which they are appointed?

The Prime Minister of Pakistan has not yet formally replied, but the Acting United Kingdom High Commissioner in Karachi has been informed that the Pakistan Government would be happy to provide their own High Commissioner with, and accept from the High Commissioners of other Commonwealth countries, Prime Minister to Prime Minister letters. All the other Prime Ministers have sent favourable replies on the following lines.

[2] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Left by Mr. Thomson, Dep[uty] H[igh] C[ommissioner] for U.K. July 9/51. E. R[eid].

Australia

The Prime Minister of Australia agrees that the most appropriate procedure would be for the High Commissioners to be provided with a letter from their Prime Minister to the Prime Minister of the country to which they are appointed.

New Zealand

The Prime Minister of New Zealand has arranged that in future New Zealand High Commissioners will be provided with a letter of introduction from Prime Minister to Prime Minister. He adds that this arrangement will not preclude them from carrying at the same time a less formal letter from the Minister of External Affairs, such as it has been New Zealand's practice to provide in recent years.

South Africa

The Prime Minister of South Africa says that the Union Government readily agree to continue their practice of furnishing their High Commissioners with letters of introduction from Prime Minister to Prime Minister.

Ceylon

The Prime Minister of Ceylon agrees that it is desirable for Commonwealth Governments other than India to decide upon a uniform manner of accrediting High Commissioners exchanged among themselves, and that letters from Prime Minister to Prime Minister would be appropriate. Mr. Senanayake adds that he has in fact written such letters for High Commissioners recently appointed by the Ceylon Government, and that in his view uniformity in the wording of the letters of accreditation is not necessary.

In the light of the foregoing replies, I think that we may now all proceed on the assumption that in future High Commissioners, other than those exchanged with India, will be furnished with an appropriate letter from their Prime Minister. For our part we shall now arrange that United Kingdom High Commissioners appointed hence-forward shall carry such a letter. I agree with the Prime Minister of Ceylon that there need not be uniformity of drafting and hope that this view will find general acceptance.

So far as the form of the letter is concerned, I quite agree that the wording should be different from that used in the Commissions given to the United Kingdom and Indian High Commissioners in New Delhi and London. So long as the general practice is uniform, as it is now agreed that it shall be, the actual form of words can no doubt be left to the Prime Minister concerned.

I have written in similar terms to the Prime Ministers of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and Ceylon.

I have also sent a letter to the Prime Minister of Pakistan telling him that the new arrangements have the approval of the other Prime Ministers, and that I hope that he too will find them acceptable.

A copy of this letter has been sent to your High Commissioner in London.

Yours sincerely,

C.R. ATTLEE

DEAN OF DIPLOMATIC CORPS

Please arrange for delivery of the following telegram from the Prime Minister of Canada to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. Message begins:

1. The present Brazilian Ambassador who is Dean of the Diplomatic Corps will be leaving Ottawa shortly. Next in order of precedence are the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom, the High Commissioner for Australia, the Ambassador of Chile and the Ambassador of China.

2. As you are doubtless aware, at the meeting of Prime Ministers in 1948 approval was given to a report of the Committee appointed to consider the status of High Commissioners. This report stated that "it was agreed that there was no good reason why a High Commissioner should not become the doyen of the Diplomatic Corps, but that it was unnecessary to press the point" and then concluded that "there is no objection, on the assumption that this is not pressed, to the diplomatic doyen of the Diplomatic Corps continuing to take precedence over other Ambassadors or High Commissioners". Application of this conclusion to the situation in Ottawa would result in the Deanship devolving upon the Chilean Ambassador and, when he leaves, upon the Chinese Ambassador. This latter eventuality would create considerable embarrassment not only for the Canadian Government but also for representatives in Ottawa of those Governments which have ceased to recognize the Nationalist regime which he represents.

3. We feel that the close relations between the nations of the Commonwealth should not be an obstacle to the acceptance by the representative of the United Kingdom of a precedence and an honour which would be readily accorded to the representative of a nation with which our relations are much less intimate.

4. I would hope that the United Kingdom Government would have no objection to the Deanship going normally according to seniority to the United Kingdom High Commissioner, a course which would give us pleasure and might spare us possible embarrassment; if you concur I shall notify other Commonwealth Governments that we propose with your concurrence to recognize the United Kingdom High Commissioner as the successor of the present Dean.

5. I need scarcely add that Sir Alexander Clutterbuck possesses qualities which would make him a most distinguished Dean of the Diplomatic Corps in Ottawa. Message ends.

DEAN OF DIPLOMATIC CORPS

1. The following message dated November 26 has been received for Mr. St. Laurent from Mr. Churchill, Begins: "Thank you so much for your message. It is very good of you to consult us on this and I am gratified by your kind references to Sir Alexander Clutterbuck. If you wish him to be Dean, and if this is also the wish of the Diplomatic Corps, we should raise no objections." Ends.

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 27, 1951

You are probably aware that some members of the Diplomatic Corps appear to be uneasy about the Note† which was circulated recently whereby the Canadian Government notified Heads of Missions that a Commonwealth High Commissioner could now become Dean of the Corps and that on the departure of Dr. Paes, the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom would succeed him.[3]

2. During the conversation I had with the Italian Ambassador yesterday, when I handed him the answer to the Italian Note on the Peace Treaty,[4] I raised this issue with Mr. di Stefano to try and clarify the matter. I asked him how he felt about the ruling on the succession to Dr. Paes and what reactions it had among the local Heads of Mission. Mr. di Stefano told me that personally he had found our Note rather upsetting but that he certainly did not intend to make any official protest. He added that he had discussed it only with two of his diplomatic colleagues, Messrs. du Parc and Woodward, and that both had agreed with his interpretation. His main argument is that Governments have nothing to do with the designation of a Dean who, normally, is appointed by the Diplomatic Corps. According to a long-standing tradition, the Dean is either the Papal Nuncio or the senior Ambassador. Mr. di Stefano pointed out that according to this established tradition, Sir Alexander Clutterbuck could only become Dean were he a full-fledged Ambassador.

3. I told the Italian Ambassador that none of his comments were irrelevant and that if he so wished he could make a good diplomatic case against the action taken by the Canadian Government. I added that taking the accords of the Congress of Vienna as a landmark in world history he could go a step further and make a good legal case against Canada ever having become an independent country. I further pointed out that he was familiar enough with Canadian policy to realize that in the slow process of constitutional evolution leading to a clarification of our international status, there were and there would continue to be problems, the solution of which might not always be tidy. In such circumstances, we were sure that our friends would understand and that this was one of those cases where we hoped we could rely on him.

4. Mr. di Stefano assured me that these considerations had come to his mind and that as a matter of fact he had appended them to our Note when he transmitted copy of it to his own Government. I told him that if it were at all possible, the best policy might be to take that line also in private conversations with his colleagues. God or/and Machiavelli only knows or know whether he will do so.

I enclose a copy of despatch No. 15 of March 1, 1951 from the Minister in Stockholm concerning the possibility of sending a political officer to Helsinki.

Mr. Moran has commented on this despatch in the following terms:

"We can't do this just now

(a) because we haven't a Foreign Service Officer to spare

(b) no provision for the extra cost has been made in next year's Estimates.

It would be useful to consult the Divisions concerned and obtain their views as to the need."

I am therefore passing on to you this information for whatever comments you may care to make.

DESPATCH 15 Stockholm, March 1, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

OFFICE IN HELSINKI, FINLAND

1. The purpose of this despatch is to enquire whether any thought has been given in the Department to the question of opening an office in Finland with a Secretary who would act as Chargé d'Affaires except when I am actually visiting that country. This officer would in the circumstances probably have to be at least F.S.O. 2 — somewhat higher rank would perhaps be desirable.

2. You will recall that at the time of the appointment of the Assistant Military Attaché to this mission, the Department of National Defence suggested that he might reverse our present procedure by residing in Helsinki and visiting Stockholm from time to time. To this suggestion I replied that in my view it would not be wise to have a Service attaché open an office in Finland without the presence there also of a political officer. I am still of this view.

3. There seems now, however, to be a definite possibility that a second department of the government, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, will have to consider opening an office in Finland. Certainly the increase in interest in emigrating to Canada in Finland during the past months has been so great as almost to frighten us here. On one day this week some 400 letters came from Finland and it looks as if the daily average might soon reach this figure. It is, of course, quite impossible for the visa section here to deal with these and at the same time cope with the local customers to whom some 80 visas per day are being issued.

4. I would not be inclined to take the same deep objection to the opening of a visa office by itself in Helsinki as I took in the case of the proposal to send a Service attaché there by himself. I cannot say, however, that I would be altogether happy were we to send visa officers to that country unaccompanied by a political officer of our own Service. It might be argued that there is a precedent for this in the establishment of visa offices in Austria where we have no political officers, but it seems to me that the situation in Finland is not really comparable. First and foremost there is the deep desire on the part of the Finns that we should as soon as possible open a permanent legation in their capital and I think, although I have no basis in fact for the thought, that they would be unhappy were we to send officials of the Canadian Government of, if I may dare to put it this way, not quite so exalted status as diplomatic officers, in the first instance. In the second place, in our experience here there have been many occasions when in my view political advice to the visa officers has been useful. This would, I am sure, be even more the case in Finland.

5. There is no question in my mind that a junior officer who could act as Chargé d'Affaires in a permanent legation in Finland could find plenty to do to occupy his time. There is a certain amount of consular work and there is a wide open information field. There are also problems of registration of Canadian citizens and the determination of Canadian nationality in doubtful cases. In addition, as I suggested above, such an officer would be called upon very often to assist and advise visa officers if they were there, as they will probably have to be.

6. The arguments which I set forth above are for the most part almost self-evident truths, as I am sure you will agree. I appreciate, however, the two over-riding problems which you have to consider arising from shortages of officer personnel and the necessity for economies in the expenditure of funds at the present time. These I know must eventually determine any decision in this matter. I would venture to suggest, however, that if a visa office[5] is to be opened in Helsinki, the relatively small extra expense to the Canadian tax-payer of sending a political officer along as well would be justifiable.

7. I understand that the establishment for the Stockholm mission recently recommended to Treasury provides for two junior political officers. In ordinary circumstances I would prefer to have the second junior officer resident in Stockholm, specializing to some degree on Finnish affairs and perhaps visiting that country regularly and perhaps more often that we do now. If, however, another Department or other Departments in Ottawa wish to have officers permanently in Helsinki, the best plan would be to establish a mission there to which they could be attached. If this were done, the Assistant Military Attaché could live in Helsinki in accordance with the original desire of the Department of National Defence.

Note de la Direction européenne pour la Direction de l'organisation et de l'effectif

Memorandum from European Division to Establishments and Organization Division

I refer to your memorandum of March 15, 1951, enclosing a copy of Despatch No. 15 of March 1, 1951 from the Canadian Minister in Stockholm concerning the possibility of posting a political officer to Helsinki.

2. In view of Mr. Moran's comments it seems clear that we cannot this year appoint a political officer to Helsinki. It is, however, to be hoped that lack of funds and a shortage of personnel will not remain permanent obstacles to the expansion of Canada's representation abroad. Mr. Stone has put forward a strong case on

[5] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I think he means Immigration's office. I suggest we take this up with Citiz[enship] & Im[migration] Dept. See below. [Joseph Jean Martial Coté] practical grounds for permanent Canadian representation in Helsinki and on those grounds this Division supports him.

3. There is the further consideration that relations between Finland and the U.S.S.R. offer an important field of investigation and political reporting particularly in these days of East-West tension. In Finland we have a small and sturdy nation living in uneasy proximity to the Soviet Union. Its whole economy is still heavily influenced by the necessity of delivering reparations to the U.S.S.R. and its political life is determined by its struggle to retain its independence in the face of Soviet interference expressed through threats, warnings and propaganda. Finland is perhaps the last country in Europe which the Soviet Union can take over without a struggle and without precipitating a world war. Yet the treatment which Soviet Russia metes out to Finland is puzzlingly inconsistent. It sometimes looks as if the Soviet Union wants to keep Finland as a horrid example of capitalist democracy in the process of disintegrating, a process which the Russians accelerate by devious rather than open means. There can be few Europeans with as intimate a knowledge of the ways of Soviet diplomacy as the Finns. A political observer permanently stationed in Finland would have an unrivalled opportunity of reporting at first hand on the spectacle of an independent David living on uneasy terms with his neighbour, Goliath. Mr. Stone has, for example, sent us a most interesting despatch (Finland Despatch No. 67 of December 21, 1950) on what he terms the paradoxes of Finnish neutrality and Finnish independence which he relates to Swedish neutrality. The excellence of the reporting on Finnish affairs makes us regret its relative infrequency.

4. The present coalition government is having great difficulty with the economic situation of the country as we learn from newspaper articles but not from our representatives in Stockholm. The latter obviously cannot look after all the work of the Canadian Legation in Sweden and do a good job of reporting from afar on the affairs of Finland, a country with more than half the population of Sweden, a difficult economic situation and a complex political life.

5. There can be no question that the Finns would welcome Canadian representation in their country. Mr. Stone does not exaggerate when he speaks of the "deep desire on the part of the Finns that we should as soon as possible open a permanent legation in their capital". The presence of the Western Allies in Berlin has enabled Germans there to give the most encouraging proof of their desire to line up with the forces of democracy; it has also given the Allies a foothold behind the Iron Curtain. A permanent Canadian representation in Helsinki would encourage the Finns, who live on one of the frontiers of the Atlantic Pact, and would give us a useful listening post near the Soviet Union in a country where the relations of the national Communist party to the Soviet Union are of an unusually interesting nature.

6. It is, therefore, recommended that in any plans for the expansion of Canadian representation abroad the claims of Finland should be given favourable consideration.

Memorandum from Minister in Sweden

CONFIDENTIAL [Stockholm], July 13, 1951

OPENING OF A LEGATION OFFICE IN FINLAND

The various Sections of the Legation have sent me memoranda on this question as you requested. The following paragraphs give an outline of them, and also of some consular and political considerations which occurred to me.

2. The Visa Section, as you know, has been pressing hard for an office in Helsinki for two or three months now. Mr. Knowles' attached memorandum† is worth reading in full, as his is certainly the most important part of the problem. The following main points emerge from it:

(a) The Visa Section is now issuing more visas to Finns than to all other nationals combined. Nearly 53% of the 940 visas issued in June went to Finns, compared to 31% in May, 19% in April, and 6% back in January. Over two-thirds of outstanding applications now are from Finns. This means that the proportion of visas issued to Finns may reach 65% before levelling off.

(b) To handle this large Finnish business the Visa Section has to use roster doctors in Helsinki for medical examinations and the British Legation there for security screening. Roster doctors are never entirely satisfactory, and we must be imposing rather a lot on the British.

(c) Serious hardships are too often caused to Finns because they must come to Stockholm finally to get their visas. After they have received medical and security clearance in Helsinki they are called over here for visa examination. Before coming they very often sell their homes and possessions in Finland and buy their tickets for Canada. Sometimes it happens that visas must be refused after the examination here. It is then usually too late for the applicants to claim reimbursement of their tickets or to regain possession of their property in Finland. More serious hardships are caused when the applicants come to Stockholm with their entire families, despite instructions that the head of the family must go to Canada in advance. You will remember that Mr. Solanko of the Finnish Foreign Office drew this to your notice when you were in Finland last month.

(d) Quite often Mr. Knowles has taken it upon himself, when these more serious hardship cases arise, to issue visas contrary to regulations. He has explained to his Department that these problems can only be solved by opening an office in Helsinki, and that until then he feels he must interpret the regulations rather according to the spirit than the letter. But this of course is not entirely satisfactory.

Mr. Moran. This is the Stockholm memo[randum] A.D.P.H[eeney] Aug 7.

3. The Commercial Section feels that trade possibilities between Canada and Finland would not justify the posting of a full time Commercial Secretary in Helsinki. But Mr. Bachand considers that it would be helpful to have a Canadian mission there which could from time to time make commercial inquiries, promote the Canadian International Trade Fair, and help Canadian business visitors. At present he has to call upon the British Commercial Secretary for assistance, particularly for inquiries regarding the end-use of Canadian exports to Finland.

4. Service Attachés. Group Captain Rutledge does not consider it necessary to have a full time Service Attaché in Helsinki, in view of the small size of the Finnish armed forces, the limited usefulness of Helsinki as a listening post, and the fact that JIB inquiries are being adequately made by others. He adds, however, that the opening of an office in Finland would, of course, help the Service Attachés from Stockholm on their periodic visits over there.

5. Consular Section. We do our best to handle citizenship and passport cases in Finland from here. But often Canadian citizens in Finland take their troubles to the British Consul in the first instance, or we ourselves are obliged to invite his help at some stage in certain cases. The British Consul maintains a register of Canadian citizens and the responsibility for consular protection in the event of an emergency would fall on him.

6. Chancery. These are some political considerations that occur to me:

(a) We want to give Finland every support in maintaining its place in the western democratic system.

(b) We would be better able from Helsinki to convince Canadians that Finland is part of that system and is not behind the iron curtain.

(c) We should have a political officer in Helsinki to give political guidance to the Visa Section if one is opened there, and to the Commercial Secretary and Service Attachés on their visits.

(d) Eventually we must face up to the necessity of reciprocating the presence of a Finnish diplomatic mission in Ottawa.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A PERMANENT OFFICE IN FINLAND

1. Diplomatic relations between Canada and Finland were established in 1947 with the opening of a Finnish Legation in Ottawa. At that time, the Finnish Government was informed that Canada could not immediately reciprocate owing to lack of trained personnel. The Finnish Government, therefore, accepted our suggested alternative that the Canadian Minister to Sweden, when appointed, should also be accredited to Finland. Accordingly, in September, 1949, Mr. T.A. Stone presented his credentials as the first Canadian Minister to Finland and has represented us there from time to time. This arrangement, however, has not proved too satisfactory.

2. Finland is the only Scandinavian state in Europe where Canada has no resident representative. That this matter is of some concern to the Finnish Government is evident from the frequency with which the Finnish Minister in Ottawa has raised the question of permanent Canadian representation in Helsinki. To open a permanent office in that country, therefore, would be a gesture which would be appreciated by the Finns and would be interpreted by them as an indication of Canada's recognition of and continued support for Finnish independence.

3. The Service Attachés in Sweden are also accredited to Finland. The Assistant Military Attaché particularly makes visits to Finland from time to time. The establishment of an office in Finland would facilitate the work of these Attachés and would make possible the permanent stationing of an Attaché in Finland should the Department of National Defence wish to improve its arrangements for information on Finland.

4. It is considered that the most economical way of meeting the needs of the various Canadian Government agencies which must carry out business in Finland and of satisfying the wishes of the Finnish Government would be by opening an office in Helsinki under the direction of a diplomatic officer resident there. This officer would be Chargé d'Affaires in the absence of the Head of Post who normally would continue to reside in Stockholm, but who would remain accredited as the Canadian Minister to Finland, visiting that country from time to time.

5. It is therefore recommended that:

(a) A permanent Canadian office be established in Helsinki under the direction of a resident diplomatic officer;

(b) The Canadian Minister to Sweden continue as Head of the Canadian mission to Finland; the resident diplomatic officer supervise the office as Chargé d'Affaires;

c) This Department be authorized to increase its establishment to provide the necessary additional supporting staff which will result from this change in Canada's representation in Finland and to provide in its Estimates for the expenses of maintaining this office.[7]

I should have told you before this that during the North Atlantic Council meeting[8] I had two discussions with the Portuguese Foreign Minister on the question of an exchange of diplomatic representatives. He felt very strongly that it was unnatural and unfortunate that Portugal alone of the North Atlantic countries should have no diplomatic representative in Ottawa. I told him that I reciprocated his feelings, but that our difficulties at the moment were financial; that we were concentrating everything at the moment on our defence programme. This argument did not impress him very much, any more than it impressed me! I added that I hoped that before long the situation would change and that there would be an exchange of diplomatic representatives.

2. I have mentioned this matter to the Prime Minister, who feels that we should take steps soon to convert our Consulate into a Legation (the Portuguese do not wish an Embassy) and to receive a Portuguese Minister here.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION IN PORTUGAL

Attached is a copy of Despatch No. 36 of October 26th from the Acting Consul General in Lisbon, reporting recent pressure tactics employed by the Portuguese Ministry of Foreign Affairs, which would appear to be designed to hasten our decision on diplomatic representation at Lisbon. According to Mr. Glass, the Secretary General has informed him that the present modus operandi could not under any circumstances continue, since it is against all diplomatic tradition and procedure, and that while matters presently outstanding, particularly the Visa Modification Agreement, could be carried to a conclusion by the Consulate, thereafter another channel would have to be used.

2. Mr. Glass requests our instructions as to future communications with the Portuguese authorities and asks whether, until more permanent means are decided upon, use should be made of the British Embassy.

3. It is unfortunate that this rather crude manoeuvre should have occurred at just this time, since the Portuguese authorities may get the impression, if a favourable decision is made in the near future on diplomatic representation in Portugal, that it was in some way related to their virtual ultimatum. With reference to the request for instructions, I assume that it would be best to delay a reply until we see whether a Cabinet decision is likely to be forthcoming in the near future. If the decision is not unduly delayed, and is favourable, I should imagine that the Portuguese Ministry of Foreign Affairs might be persuaded to hold their fire in view of the impending regularization of our position in Lisbon.[9]

DESPATCH 36 [Lisbon], October 26, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION IN PORTUGAL

Yesterday, the Count of Tovar, Secretary General of the Portuguese Ministry of Foreign Affairs requested my presence at the Ministry. Upon arriving there I learned that he wished to discuss the question of Canada's representation in Portugal.

2. He commenced by saying that for some time past Portugal had been most desirous of entering into formal diplomatic relations with Canada which desire had been intensified since both countries are members of NATO. He said that Mr. Paulo Cunha, Portuguese Minister of Foreign Affairs had, when in Ottawa attending the NATO Conference, broached the subject with the Canadian Authorities and had been promised consideration and an early decision. He is disappointed that no reply has yet been received.

3. Count Tovar then said that the present modus operandi could not under any circumstances continue; that to give to a Consul access to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and to accept from him communications from his Government was against all diplomatic tradition and procedure. He assured me that there was nothing personal in the decision, that indeed the contacts had been both pleasant and, he admitted, convenient but the Portuguese Government was determined to revert to a strictly formal Diplomatic relationship. He stated that so far as he was aware there had never been a parallel in the history of Portugal and certainly never had such privileges been extended to a Consul as I have enjoyed during the past four years. He also said that Portugal could not remain in such an anomalous position in the face of the decision taken by the Vatican concerning Mr. Marion Taylor and the refusal to give recognition to a new Personal Representative of Mr. Truman.

4. I reminded him that the Portuguese Consul in Montreal enjoyed facilities at least the equivalent of mine and pointed out also that with the ever increasing number of international bodies on which Canada is represented there was difficulty in finding trained senior officers to fill existing diplomatic posts. His reply was that the Portuguese Government did not wish to create any difficulties nor to place obstacles in the way of intercourse between the two Governments and would gladly accept any means of communication Canada might adopt providing such means follow the traditional channels of diplomacy.

5. Count Tovar also referred to our request for "the usual courtesies and privileges" on behalf of Mr. Birkett, Canadian Government Trade Commissioner in Johannesburg, whose territory includes Mozambique. This was the subject of my Note† to the Ministry of the 22nd of January of this year and to which no reply has been received. He said that Portugal did not and could not officially recognize these hitherto unknown titles particularly as normal practice was to appoint Consuls. I explained the development and functions of Trade Commissioners and mentioned their acceptance in various countries including Spain where the Trade Commissioner enjoys full diplomatic regalia. His reply was that it was up to each country to decide but that Portugal was determined to follow traditional diplomatic procedure.

6. He agreed that matters presently outstanding, particularly the Visa Modification Agreement, could be carried to conclusion by the Consulate but thereafter another channel would have to be used.

7. You may recall that in my annual reports I have more than once referred to the nature of our relationship with the Ministry for Foreign Affairs and sounded a note of warning that it might one day come to an end as it was so entirely foreign to the Portuguese who are the very breath of Protocol.

8. I would appreciate your instructions as to future communications with the Portuguese Authorities and if, until more permanent means are decided upon, I should make use of the British Embassy.

DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATION IN PORTUGAL

1. Canada has had since December 1945 a Consulate-General in Lisbon, Portugal, under the supervision of a Trade Commissioner, who has had the designation of Acting Consul-General. Since October 1947, Portugal has been represented in Canada by a Consul-General in Montreal. Portugal proposed an exchange of diplomatic missions early in 1947, but was informed that, because of shortages of trained personnel, Canada would not be able to act upon the suggestion. During the recent North Atlantic Council Meeting in Ottawa, the Portuguese Foreign Minister urged that Canada and Portugal proceed to an early exchange of diplomatic missions. A similar and more recent approach has been made to the Acting Consul-General by the Secretary-General of the Portuguese Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

2. In evaluating the importance of establishing some form of diplomatic representation in Portugal, primary consideration should be given to the fact that Portugal is the only one of the North Atlantic Treaty nations with which Canada has not exchanged diplomatic representatives. On political grounds, therefore, it would seem advisable that this renewed request of the Government of Portugal be met as soon as possible.

3. From a point of view of commerce, the preservation and development of the Portuguese market for Canadian fish and other natural products is of considerable importance. Our Acting Consul-General and Trade Commissioner has stated on a number of occasions that he has been handicapped in his trade promotion work because of his non-diplomatic status.

4. It is, therefore, recommended that:

(i) the status of the Canadian Consulate-General in Lisbon be raised to that of a diplomatic mission;

(ii) the Canadian Ambassador to Ireland be also appointed and accredited Head of the Canadian Mission in Portugal. If this recommendation is approved, it would be the intention to have the Canadian Ambassador to Ireland spend three or four months in a year in Portugal. During the absence of the Head of Mission, it is proposed that, for the present, the office remain under the supervision of the Trade Commissioner. It is thought that this arrangement will satisfactorily meet the wishes of the Portuguese Government while at the same time providing us with adequate diplomatic representation at minimum cost in money and personnel;

(iii) this Department be authorized, to increase its establishment to provide the necessary additional supporting staff which will result from this change in Canada's representation in Portugal, and to provide in its Estimates for the expenses of maintaining this office.[10]

SECURITY; POSSIBLE MEASURES IN CONNECTION WITH CITIZENSHIP, IMMIGRATION AND TRAVEL

28. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, referring to discussion at the meeting of November 22nd, 1950, said that an interdepartmental committee had been considering possible measures that might be taken, if desired, to deal with Communists and Communist sympathizers so far as citizenship, immigration and travel were concerned. With regard to naturalization, the committee thought that no change in policy was necessary but that in a public statement it be made clear that citizenship would not be granted to Communists or Communist sympathizers. The committee recommended that there be a discretionary power to revoke the citizenship of naturalized Canadians for residence of two years (rather than six) in the country of which the naturalized person was formerly a national, and that the provision for revocation on grounds of disaffection or disloyalty be broadened. It was also recommended that revocation of citizenship be possible for all categories of citizens, whether by birth or naturalization, in cases where there had been an oath or affirmation or other formal declaration of allegiance to a foreign state. These recommendations appeared to be desirable. So far as disaffection and disloyalty were concerned, it would not be desirable to leave it entirely to the discretion of the Minister to determine whether a person in Canada had been disloyal or disaffected. It would be desirable to provide, in the case of persons in Canada, that revocation take place only after conviction by a court of law for sedition, espionage, treason or any other offence involving disaffection or disloyalty. This would be broader than the present provision.

With regard to immigration entry and deportation there would be provisions included in amending legislation that would be presented for introduction at the forthcoming session. The policy on immigration entry appeared sufficiently strict at present but the statutory provisions needed amendment. As to deportation, the difficulties of carrying it out had to be considered and it appeared that the recommendations of the committee might be somewhat too broad.

29. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that the committee made a number of recommendations concerning travel to the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries. It would be useful if these could be examined by members of the Cabinet and considered at a later meeting. As to the form of passports, it was recommended that the "prayer for safe conduct" be deleted. This appeared to be desirable.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

30. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the comments of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning suggested measures directed at Communists in connection with citizenship, immigration and travel, and agreed:

(a) that draft legislation be prepared for amendment of the Canadian Citizenship Act and the Immigration Act along the lines indicated by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the legislation to be considered at a subsequent meeting;

(b) that the Department of External Affairs consider what revision of the form of Canadian passports would be desirable to eliminate the "prayer for safe conduct" and to take into account the amendments to be made to the Citizenship Act; and

(c) that consideration be given at a subsequent meeting to proposals relating to travel to the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries.

TRAVEL BY CANADIAN COMMUNISTS

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussions at the meeting on January 24th, 1951, said that, in consultation with other interested authorities, his department had given further consideration to possible restrictions on travel by Canadian communists. It was now considered that to refuse passports to a list of communists which might be regarded as a list of those likely to be interned in the event of war would not in fact prevent their reaching the Soviet Union and satellite countries, would indicate to the communist organization which persons are earmarked for internment, and would involve a new principle that was open to objections. Again, to require communists to secure a permit to travel behind the "iron curtain" would be embarrassing since it would result in their travelling with express permission of the government. It therefore appeared that the disadvantages of taking action directed specifically at the travel of communists would outweigh the advantages.

It seemed desirable, however, to take steps which would permit the government to keep itself informed of movements of Canadian communists. To this end, he recommended that the passport regulations be revised to require all holders of Canadian passports, before travelling to the U.S.S.R. or satellite countries, to inform the Department of External Affairs of their intention to undertake such travel and of the length and purpose of their visit and, upon entry to such countries, to give notice to the Canadian, or if appropriate, United Kingdom diplomatic mission of their arrival and, later, of their intention to depart. The regulations might provide that the penalty for non-compliance with these procedures would be cancellation of the passports of offenders. Such regulations, by requiring communist travellers to indicate their movements, might inhibit their freedom of action to some extent. The new requirement could be explained as designed to make it easier for the government to give diplomatic protection to Canadian travellers in the countries in question.

It would also be advantageous to take further administrative action whereby the R.C.M. Police would notify the security authorities of a friendly country whenever they learned that a Canadian communist was planning to visit such a country. This would enable the authorities of that country to refuse entry to the traveller.

The proposal to remove from Canadian passports the present "prayer for safe conduct" in the name of the King was under discussion with the U.K. authorities.

6. The Prime Minister thought that the proposed arrangement for notification of security authorities in friendly countries of travel by known communists should be reciprocal.

7. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) approved in principle the proposals of the Secretary of State for External Affairs for the revision of the passport regulations with a view to enabling the government to keep itself informed of the travel of Canadian communists to the Soviet Union and satellite countries, it being understood that, when drafted, the proposed regulations would be submitted for consideration;

(b) approved the Minister's proposal for notification, to the security authorities of friendly countries, of expected visits of Canadian communists, on the understanding that this arrangement would be reciprocal; and,

(c) noted the Minister's report that the question of the removal from Canadian passports of the present "prayer for safe conduct" was under discussion with the United Kingdom.

CANADIAN PASSPORT REGULATIONS: ARTICLE RE TRAVEL TO U.S.S.R. AND SATELLITE COUNTRIES IN EUROPE

11. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, referring to the discussion at the meeting on March 8th, 1951, when approval in principle had been given to modification of the passport regulations to enable the government to keep itself informed of the travel of Canadian communists to the Soviet Union and satellite countries in Europe, submitted for approval a draft article for inclusion in these regulations. This had been drafted on the lines contemplated at the earlier meeting and included provision for a notice to travellers regarding such visits. The U.K. Foreign Office had indicated that it was prepared to have its posts abroad provide information that came to their attention with regard to Canadians visiting these countries.

12. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved for inclusion in the Canadian Passport Regulations, as proposed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the text of an article which would enable the government to keep itself informed of travel by holders of Canadian passports to the Soviet Union and satellite countries in Europe, and agreed that this article be published in the Canada Gazette and that copies of the notice to travellers, referred to in the article, be given to all applicants for passport facilities.[13]

1. The Political Committee of the General Assembly met yesterday (3 January) at 10.45 a.m. and received the report of the Cease-Fire Group[1] which was presented by Sir Benegal Rau.[2] In an air-mail letter yesterday to the Under-Secretary I am sending a copy of this report. After hearing the report and after some debate, the Political Committee adjourned for forty-eight hours until 10.45 a.m., Friday, 5th January.

2. Prior to the meeting of the Political Committee the Cease-Fire Group held an informal meeting with the United States delegation, at the request of the latter. In reply to a question from Gross, the members of the Group informed him that their report would be of a purely factual nature and would not contain recommendations. Gross then said that he understood Austin would wish to speak at the meeting of the political Committee. In the opinion of the United States delegation it would be insufficient for the Political Committee merely to meet, receive a report of failure from the Cease-Fire Group, and then adjourn without any discussion. The United States delegation considered this would be inadequate in view of the all-out Chinese attack now taking place below the 38th Parallel. Gross said that Austin's statement would be short and of a general nature, and would emphasize the gravity of the situation and the necessity for unity within the free world. The members of the Group indicated that they did not consider that they were in a position to dissuade any delegation from speaking on their report if such a delegation were ready to do so.

3. When the meeting of the Political Committee opened the first speaker was Rau, who read out the report of the Cease-Fire Group. He emphasized the purely factual nature of the report. He also stressed that, despite this initial failure, the United Nations must continue to make every effort to bring about an end of the hostilities.

4. The next speaker was Malik, who made a vituperative propaganda attack on the United States in which he repeated all the former Soviet allegations regarding United States aggression in Korea and the atrocities committed by the United States forces as well as the "Syngman Rhee hangmen". He also remarked that the people of Western Europe, as well as the people of Asia, must now realize that they were only regarded as cannon fodder by the United States militarists. He concluded by proposing that the First Committee should see a film concerning alleged United States atrocities in Korea which was in the possession of the Soviet delegation.

5. Austin replied in a generally restrained and dignified manner, considering the provocation given him by Malik. He commended the efforts of the Cease-Fire Group. He said that the constant ignoring and rebuffing of these efforts by the Chinese Communists left no doubt as to where the blame lay for the failure to reach a cease-fire. He said that the large-scale offensive across the 38th Parallel being undertaken by the Chinese Communist forces "compounds the original aggression" and that the free world must consider what the next step should be, in view of this new situation. He emphasized that the United Nations must demonstrate that the free world was united in resisting aggression, and that the United Nations troops must remain in Korea. He also said, however, that the door should be held open for every attempt to find an "honourable solution". He concluded by saying that the Committee should adjourn for a short period to permit representatives time to study the Cease-Fire Group's report and in order to allow consultation in an atmosphere of "fresh air" as distinct from the "polluted atmosphere" created by Malik's statement.

6. The Norwegian representative, Sunde, then asked the Cease-Fire Group whether they had given consideration to the formulation of principles underlying the negotiation of outstanding issues, which could be put into effect if a cease-fire were achieved. This intervention by Sunde was really an "arranged question", as the members of the Cease-Fire Group had asked him, prior to the meeting, to address such a question to them.

7. Mr. Pearson then replied on behalf of the Cease-Fire Group and assured the Committee that the Group had given serious consideration to the formulation of such principles. He emphasized, however, that the cease-fire must come first, before any such principles could be acted upon. He said that at a later stage the Cease-Fire Group might be able to inform the Committee of their views on these principles for negotiation, but that they were not at present in a position to do so.

8. Jebb then made a short intervention in reply to Malik and also moved the adjournment of the Committee for a period of forty-eight hours in order to allow representatives time to study the Cease-Fire Group's report. After a short discussion this motion for adjournment was adopted by a vote of 46 in favour, 5 against, and 7 abstentions. The Soviet bloc opposed the motion, claiming that the Committee should take up the previously submitted Soviet resolution on this question. Mr. Pearson abstained on the motion, as did the other members of the Cease-Fire Group.

9. A report on negotiations preceding the meeting is being given in separate telegrams from Mr. Pearson.

CEASE FIRE FOR KOREA

Following from Pearson, Begins: I met with Entezam and Rau on Tuesday, both morning and afternoon, to put in final form the report of the Cease Fire Group. A copy of the report as finally presented has been sent to you by airmail. In preparing the final draft, I was anxious to incorporate wording which would indicate that the Cease Fire Group regarded as a satisfactory basis for discussion the suggestions which had been put forward by the Unified Command. I wished also to have the report make clear the fact that responsibility for our inability to make a recommendation rested with the Chinese authorities in Peking. On both these points Rau was cooperative. Although, in the end, the wording which he was prepared to accept in regard to the second point was not as strong as I proposed, I think the object I had in mind has been secured.

2. During our meeting in the morning, we agreed on all parts of the report except the concluding paragraph. When we came to consider the last paragraph, Rau said that he wished to report on conversations he had had during the week-end with Malik of the U.S.S.R. and with Gross. As a result of a meeting of Asian states, he and Fawzi Bey had called on Malik to determine if possible the attitude of the Soviet delegation to the second Asian resolution.[3] He said they had been received with the customary Soviet statements about American imperialist aggression, but in the end Malik had not said clearly that the Soviet delegation would oppose a resolution along the lines of the second Asian resolution. As a result of his conversation with Gross, who had indicated again the extent to which the United States was prepared to go in committing itself to the general terms of a Far Eastern settlement, Rau had considered the possibility of preparing a statement of principles on which a settlement might be based, in which both sides could acquiesce, and which might be added to the report of the Cease Fire Group. The text of these principles, in a revised form, is given in my immediately following teletype. As Rau first showed them to us, they were at some points dangerously ambiguous, and they were also based rather too obviously on the assumption that large scale fighting would not be renewed in Korea.

3. I told Rau that, provided it was made clear that the Group realized the imminence of renewed fighting in Korea, and the effect that a new Chinese offensive would have on all proposals for a cease fire and subsequent negotiation, and subject to some revision in the language, I thought there might be a good deal of merit in his suggestion. It was agreed that during the lunch-hour, I should sound out the Americans, and that I should also do some work on the text of Rau's statement of principles.

4. I saw Gross and Ross during lunch and showed them a copy of the draft report as it stood. I also gave them the opportunity to comment on the draft, and two or three suggestions they made were subsequently incorporated. I then discussed with them the question of tactics and found them apparently genuinely concerned on the one hand to keep the way open for a negotiated settlement in the Far East, without on the other rendering ineffective the principles of collective security. I then raised with them the question of attaching a statement of principles which might underlie a settlement once a cease fire had been agreed upon, along the lines which had been discussed by the Group in the morning. I indicated the points which it was thought might be included in such a statement, and in some cases suggested the actual wording. I found them quite receptive to this idea, and subject to certain revisions, they thought the proposal might be helpful.

5. When the Cease Fire Group met again in the afternoon, we revised the proposed statement of principles and agreed upon an introductory passage indicating that the principles would have to be considered in the light of the military situation. At this point Rau said that he could not agree to adding the statement of principles to the report without consulting his Government. Since Mr. Nehru was in the air en route to London, it would be impossible for him to get instructions before the First Committee met on Wednesday. We therefore had to agree to submit the report without referring the proposed statement of principles, but Rau said that he might be in a position to subscribe to them at a later stage in the discussion.

6. Partly as a result of discussions on Tuesday evening with representatives of smaller states contributing to the United Nations effort in Korea, reported on in a separate telegram, I was able to carry one stage further the suggestion for a statement of principles when the Political Committee met Wednesday morning. I arranged with Sunde of Norway to ask whether, during its consideration of a cease fire, the Group had given any consideration to the principles which might underlie negotiations for a settlement following a cease fire. I had already agreed with Rau that in reply to such a question, I could indicate that some consideration had been given to such principles, and that the Group might be prepared at a later stage to suggest them if they still seemed relevant in the light of the situation in Korea. I had also gone over the revised statement of principles with Gross. I consequently replied to Sunde's question in the manner indicated, and matters were left in this position when the Political Committee adjourned until Friday afternoon.

7. In all these discussions, the primary consideration was the desirability of exhausting the possibilities of conciliation, to the satisfaction in particular of the Asian states, before proceeding to a resolution condemning the Chinese as aggressors, and to do so in a manner that would not be made ludicrous by the development of a major military offensive in Korea. The Americans, for obvious reasons, were anxious that neither the Political Committee nor their delegation should appear to be dilatory in the face of Chinese aggression. On the other hand, they seemed conscious of the desirability of being assured of as much support as possible for subsequent Assembly action in regard to Korea. A number of proposals for keeping alive the possibility of negotiation were already under consideration, including the second Asian resolution, and the Israeli proposal which had meanwhile been put in the form of a draft resolution. It seemed to me that, by adding to the Cease Fire Group's report the statement of principles to which I have referred, and by having this statement communicated to the Chinese by the President, it would be possible to carry through its final stage the conciliatory process which so many different elements in the Assembly seemed to desire. If, therefore, Rau receives clearance from Nehru, and if the circumstances are not wholly unfavourable, it may be possible for the Group on Friday to put forward the statement of principles given in my immediately following teletype. Ends.

CEASE FIRE FOR KOREA

Following from Pearson, Begins: With reference to my immediately preceding teletype, the following is the text of statement of principles, text begins:

In preparing its report, the Group recognized that the situation in Korea might quickly change in such a manner that further consideration of a cease-fire in the immediate future would be impracticable. Nevertheless, it seems worthwhile to state or re-state certain principles for the peaceful settlement of the Korean question.

1. The object of a cease-fire is to prevent needless destruction of life and property while other steps are being taken to restore peace. No cease fire arrangement can be called satisfactory unless it contains adequate safeguards for securing that it will not be used for mounting a new offensive.

2. If a cease fire occurs in Korea as a result of a formal arrangement or, indeed, as a result of a lull in hostilities pending some such arrangement, advantage should be taken of it to pursue consideration of the further steps to be taken for the restoration of peace.

3. The General Assembly has already decided, unanimously, that Korea is to be a unified, independent, democratic sovereign state with a constitution and a Government based on free popular election.

4. This will necessitate the withdrawal by appropriate stages of all armed forces from Korea and the creation by the United Nations of machinery whereby the Korean people can express their own free will.

5. Interim arrangements by the United Nations for the administration of Korea and the maintenance of peace and security therein will be necessary pending the establishment of the new Government.

6. The Governments of the U.S.A. and the United Kingdom have already announced (December 8th, 1950) that they would seek, with the Soviet and Peking Governments, through whatever channels that may be open to them a peaceful settlement of existing issues.[4] The General Assembly might therefore set up an appropriate body, including the representatives of these four Governments, to make

Following from Pearson, Begins: At dinner Tuesday evening in the Canadian Club, I met informally the representatives of a number of smaller states which have made actual contributions to the United Nations effort in Korea. Besides Riddell and myself, the following were present: Sunde of Norway, Kyrou of Greece, Shann of Australia, Sarper of Turkey, Langenhove of Belgium, Grafstrom of Sweden, Berendsen of New Zealand, Lopez of the Philippines, Jooste of South Africa, Von Balluseck of the Netherlands. Prince Wan of Thailand was invited but could not accept, and we were unable to get in touch with his alternate here.

2. This occasion had the very good effect of bringing up to date on recent developments a group of representatives who quite rightly feel that their countries have a considerable stake in the Korean operation and who have been somewhat neglected in recent consultations. I told them quite frankly that I thought they had a good deal more interest in a cease fire than some representatives who recently had come forward as negotiators, and that I was very conscious of the desirability of keeping them adequately informed. I gave them a full account of our report, of the negotiations which had accompanied it, and of the United States position vis-à-vis the Cease Fire Group in regard to the situation which would develop following the submission of our report. They seemed to appreciate this very much.

3. The discussion was very free and prolonged, and I had the feeling that a good deal of suppressed emotion amongst the group present was finding release. In general, opinion seemed on the surface to vary widely from Berendsen at the one extreme who took a strong line against any hint of appeasement, and said it would be preferable to be driven in defeat from Korea than to compromise with the international criminal, to Sunde who said that, if the Chinese would make it possible to hold honest elections in Korea no matter what the result, he would be prepared to accept the Peking regime as representing China at United Nations. Beneath these divergencies, however, there was a wide measure of agreement on the necessity of reconciling as far as possible the following objectives:

(a) A war with China must be avoided;

(b) Before proceeding to charge Communist China with aggression, as many people as possible must be convinced that no reasonable chance remains of settlement by negotiation. Since whatever effect the condemnation may have will probably derive from its moral force, wide support is essential, especially amongst Asian states;

(c) A full scale offensive in Korea will make it necessary to proceed quickly with a resolution naming the Communist Chinese as aggressors;

(d) If the Chinese are to be named as aggressors, we must have a clear understanding with the Americans as to the consequences in further Assembly action of this step;

(e) As far as possible, the integrity of the collective defence system must be preserved.

4. Towards the end of the evening I gave the group some idea of the proposal for a statement of principles which might underlie negotiations following a cease fire. They showed great interest in this suggestion, which they considered preferable to the second Asian resolution or the Israeli proposal as a method of making concrete the offer to withdraw from Korea and negotiate a settlement of other problems.[5] As a consequence of their interest and encouragement, I made arrangements with Rau and Sunde, referred to in another telegram, to give the Political Committee on Wednesday a suggestion that a statement of principles might be forthcoming. Following for Mr. St. Laurent from Pearson, Begins: You will by now have seen my telegrams to Ottawa of January 4th giving an account of the way in which a draft statement of principles concerning a Far Eastern settlement came under consideration in the Cease Fire Group. Current text of this proposed statement is given in my immediately following teletype.

2. United States delegation, which is under great pressure from public opinion here to proceed in United Nations to action of some kind against Chinese Communists, have agreed, though only after considerable persuasion, to concur in an intermediate step along the lines of the draft statement of principles. I have explained to them that the main purpose of statement would be to demonstrate conclusively that offer to settle Far Eastern issues by negotiation was sincere and had been made on unequivocal terms, and they agree that this objective is worth pursuing. It will, however, be difficult for them, in the light of public reaction to events in Korea, to acquiesce in a prolonged delay before proceeding to the next stage in the Political Committee. My own feeling is that it would be unfair to the United States, and indeed inexpedient from every point of view, to delay beyond Monday without either putting forward our statement of principles or, alternatively, admitting that it is impossible for us to do so.

3. For these reasons, I hope that there will not be an effort in London either to hold Political Committee in suspense while the merits of our principles are being scrutinized in detail, or, alternatively, to substitute for them some other course of action. I think quite frankly that the reality of the situation here will make it difficult to delay action of one kind or another beyond Monday. If we try to do so, the United States delegation may be forced to withdraw its agreement to support any intermediate stage, and may proceed at once to a resolution condemning Communist Chinese as aggressors. 1. Cease-fire in Korea. The object of such a cease-fire is to prevent needless destruction of life and property while other steps are being taken to restore peace. 1. At a meeting of Commonwealth Ambassadors at the British Embassy this morning General Sir Neil Ritchie outlined the military situation. His information was derived from Pentagon sources, but he had made some interesting calculations of his own.

2. He said that the best way of estimating the relative strength of the opposing forces was to discard listing them by armies, corps and divisions and to calculate in term of brigade groups or regimental combat teams. He reckoned that a Korean division (either North or R.O.K.) equalled a combat team. In this way he reached the conclusion that the identified enemy forces now in Korea amounted to 58 brigade groups and the United Nations forces to 35, made up of 22 United States, 9 R.O.K. and 4 others.

3. He went on to say that the diagonal line across the peninsula to which the United Nations forces are retiring was about 130 miles in length as compared with a front of 135 miles in the perimeter protecting Pusan late last summer. On the United Nations side there were now in the forward areas forces equal to 21 brigade groups (10 United States, 2 British, 1 Turk and 8 ROK). There is a strong reserve, mainly composed of the tenth corps, comprising 12 United States brigade groups, 1 ROK and 1 other in effective strength. He spoke particularly highly of the Marine division in the reserve.

4. He commented that fighting since the new attack on January 1st was "a tidy battle" proceeding along pre-determined plans on the United Nations side and with little confusion, except perhaps on the right flank where there is considerable trouble with infiltration.

5. I felt that General Ritchie was not speaking his full mind at the meeting about the prospects. After it Franks told me privately that Ritchie was much more troubled about the prospects than he had appeared to be and considered it doubtful whether any foothold could be retained for long in Korea. He has a high opinion of General Ridgway, but is not impressed by the quality of the subordinate United States commanders or of the bulk of the United States troops in Korea.

6. Franks also told me that he had discussed the military situation with Acheson yesterday on instructions from Bevin, who sought confirmation of the continued intention to make a fighting stand in Korea. Franks mentioned to Acheson the alarmist press reports coming through censorship from Tokyo and inquired whether there was any change in the directive given MacArthur to hold whatever territory he could. Acheson assured him that there has been no change in the directive, but seemed rather troubled about the position, possibly about a different interpretation of the directive by MacArthur from that understood here. While discretion must, of course, be left to the commander to decide what is essential for the safety of his forces, it might be that MacArthur is intending to conduct a fighting retreat ending in evacuation rather than to make a fighting stand. This, however, is wholly speculative.

Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: Re: My telegram No. 17 (to External) of yesterday's date to the Prime Minister.

I am still somewhat mystified by the line taken in London, and which was reported in telegram No. 28[6] (from External). I hope that you are not confusing the second and third stages of the action which may have to be taken here. I quite agree that we should delay as long as possible the third stage, which involves a condemnatory resolution. That is one reason why I thought it was important to get our statement of principles approved as quickly as possible, so that we could then delay matters until time had been given to Peking to consider it. I am convinced, however, that if we delay the second stage much longer, we may be precipitating the third stage, as opinion in the United States and among certain United Nations delegations is getting impatient and demanding action. That demand will have to be met in some form by the United States delegation. Surely the best way to do it is by introducing our resolution on principles, especially as the fact that it will be passed by a very large vote will make united and reasonable action later somewhat easier. Is the difficulty really that Nehru refuses to allow Rau to support any statement of principles here which has not previously been approved in Peking? This interpretation of events was circulating out at Lake Success yesterday, with unfortunate results. If we are to keep the United States in line on the one hand, and Indian and Asian opinion in line on the other, the sooner we reach agreement on a statement of principles and make it public, the better. Bevin's telegram to Jebb does not seem to me to give sufficient weight to the above factors, especially to the impatience and excitability of public opinion here in the face of inaction at Lake Success and heavier fighting in Korea. In any event, the Committee is meeting again on Monday and I feel that something will have to be done then or Tuesday. Your views would be much appreciated.

Incidentally, can you give me some idea of the nature of the new approach which the Prime Ministers are thinking of making to Washington. Ends.

1. The Political Committee met at 3 p.m. yesterday (5th January) to continue discussion of the report of the Cease-Fire Group. Mr. Pearson was the first speaker and, on behalf of the Group, he said that he regretted that they were not able at the present meeting to submit a statement of principles regarding negotiations following the establishment of a cease-fire. Mr. Pearson stressed that since the last meeting of the Committee, the Group had continued to work on such a statement of principles and hoped to be able to submit a report to the Committee "shortly". Meanwhile, debate in the full Committee might provide the Cease-Fire Group with some further useful ideas. Mr. Pearson also added that the Cease-Fire Group was very conscious that any statement of principles it might draft must not "in any way be disloyal to or be a betrayal of" the principles for which United Nations action was being carried on in Korea.

Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: I find your telegram to External, WA-52 on the military situation in Korea, very disturbing, indeed, especially the suggestion that while the Unified Command have given MacArthur an instruction to hold a line in Korea, MacArthur himself may have given this instruction a different interpretation. I think we have a right to know what the United States military plans are in this regard. I feel strongly about this because if MacArthur has, in fact, started on a plan to withdraw from Korea, our efforts for a cease-fire here become quite ridiculous. Isn't there any way we can, in fact, find out what the Unified Command's military plans actually are in Korea, and what MacArthur's intentions are in carrying them out?[7] Ends.

1. At a meeting in the United States delegation offices Saturday afternoon, attended by Gross and Ross of the United States delegation, Chauvel of France, Stabell of Norway, Jebb and Riddell, tactics in First Committee were discussed at some length.

2. Gross, who was under the impression that the Prime Minister's conference had asked formally as a group for postponement of debate on Korea until Friday next, was anxious to know what could be expected in the First Committee at the end of this delay. Jebb, who was speaking from his instructions to insist on postponement, was not able to suggest what might be forthcoming on Friday next, but hoped that alternative proposals to the principles suggested by the Cease Fire Group could be put forward. Jebb did not, at this time, seem to be aware of the nature of the alternative proposals, any more than we were, which left us in a somewhat difficult position.

3. Gross then indicated that he was by no means certain that United States delegation would consent to wait until next Friday before proceeding to the next stage of the procedure in regard to Korea. He said that they had been prepared to vote for the statement of principles if it could have been embodied in a resolution early next week. They were not sure, however, that the advantages of delay would out-weigh the disadvantages, and it might, therefore, be necessary for them to put forward their resolution condemning China some time during the week.

4. Gross then gave an outline of the resolution which they were contemplating, which I think you will find disturbing. He did not give a text, but outline he suggested is as follows.

"General Assembly, noting that the Central People's Government has rejected efforts to bring about a cessation of hostilities and that its armed forces continue their flagrant invasion and large-scale attacks in Korea, and noting that the Security Council has failed to exercise its primary responsibility because of the exercise of the veto, finds that the Central People's Government has flouted United Nations authority and has committed aggression. The General Assembly, therefore, calls on the Central People's Government to cause their forces and nationals to cease hostilities and withdraw from Korea, and calls on all states and authorities to refrain from giving encouragement or assistance to the Central People's Government, and calls on all states and authorities to give to the United Nations every assistance in meeting this aggression, and requests the Collective Measures Committee:

(a) To consider urgently what measures should be employed to carry out the last two preceding recommendations;

(b) To advise all states and authorities on a continuing basis on such measures;

(c) To make such recommendations to the General Assembly as it deems appropriate.

Finally, the General Assembly affirms that it continues to be the policy of the United Nations to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea with a view to a peaceful settlement, and the achievements of United Nations objective in Korea by peaceful means, and requests some unnamed body at any suitable opportunity to use its good offices to this end."

5. Immediate objection was raised to the fact that under these proposals, the Collective Measures Committee would be given authority to advise states directly on measures which they should take against the Chinese. It was pointed out that many States would object to voting for a resolution which involved them in the commitment of unknown extent, even though it were only a moral commitment to carry out the recommendations of the Collective Measures Committee. It was also pointed out that serious constitutional objections might be raised to extending the authority of the Collective Measures Committee in this way. Gross said that in their concept Collective Measures Committee was supposed to act as a restraint upon States which might take unilateral action against the Chinese, and they had clearly not considered the constitutional implications of the procedure which they suggested. Jebb suggested alternative wording by which Collective Measures Committee would be asked to make recommendations to the Assembly on actions which might be taken against the Chinese, adding that in the meantime individual States could continue action they had initiated.

6. Gross concluded by saying that he was merely giving an informal outline of ideas which they had in mind and that points which had been raised would be referred to Washington.

Please transmit the following message to High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom, from the Minister, Begins: Arrival of your telegram No. 50 of January 6th[8] clarifies position greatly for us, as I hope our telegrams, especially text of draft principles, have for you. I had assumed that Nehru, who had this document, would have produced it for the discussion on Friday, and it is unfortunate that he did not do so. I agree entirely that we should proceed as slowly and cautiously as possible here. That was the main reason why I felt that our draft principles should have been introduced for discussion and submission, if agreed on, to Peking. This would have given us a week or so — with the co-operation and support of the United States — before the next stage would be reached. Indeed, in the unlikely event that the Chinese accepted our principles, no further stage would be required. I do not think, however, we can postpone the introduction of some such document much longer into the 60-member Political Committee of the Assembly (not the Security Council as telegrams from London state). Otherwise, we run the risk of the vacuum caused by delay being filled by the introduction of a condemnatory resolution, and the intermediate stage of agreement on the principles of a settlement being abandoned. There is a real possibility of this happening. This is what worries me most. Furthermore, a study of the United Kingdom paper,[9] which is presumably a substitute for our principles, does not convince me that it is an improvement over our draft. It is, I think, too detailed for its purpose, provides too much debatable material and includes one or two things that the United States will not, I think, accept. It will look too much like a promise of a reward for aggression. Would it not be better to have the United Nations accept a shorter and more general statement such as ours, with details to be worked out later if the principles are accepted. Is there anything specifically objectionable in our document which, it should not be forgotten, has now received a pledge, though a somewhat hesitant one, of support by the United States, if it is produced before the Committee. In any event, if some alternative document is preferable, it should, I think, be ready for submission on Tuesday, as I feel we will not be able to delay matters beyond that date. However, naturally I will do my best to assist others in securing a delay, while attempting to conceal from the other 50-odd delegations the reasons for it. It would, I think, be resented at the United Nations and in this country generally if a Commonwealth discussion in London on this matter were felt to be responsible for unreasonable delay in any action being taken at Lake Success in respect of Korea. May I repeat that it is not the policy being advanced in London which worries me. I think it is the right one. It is a fear that the tactics being followed, because of the political situation in Washington and the military position in Korea, may prevent that policy being successfully carried out, and precipitate a less desirable substitute in the immediate introduction of a resolution of condemnation, and an unfortunate disagreement between the United States and the Commonwealth countries. United States opinion may also interpret developments as a concerted effort by the Commonwealth, as such, under the leadership of Nehru, to mediate between two morally equal parties, the United States and Communist China. The very suggestion of this equality in our own statement of principles in the paragraph providing for troop withdrawals caused some anxious doubts in Washington. It is an understandably sensitive point and one which should not be ignored. In short, I think that the sooner we introduce some agreed resolution on principles and stages of negotiation of Korean and related problems, the better. That means, I think, Tuesday at the latest. Ends.

He had found out previously that Rau was contemplating moving adjournment until Monday next. It was generally agreed that adjournment of a full week's duration from today would not be granted, and Rau therefore agreed to support adjournment until Thursday. The Soviet delegation of course pressed for immediate consideration of its charges against the United States, discussion of which was commenced before Christmas and then adjourned, but Committee voted them down.

2. If amendments to existing draft statement of principles, or alternative proposals, are to be suggested as a result of meetings in London, I should hope we might have them by Wednesday noon at the latest, in order that we may secure necessary clearance with other delegations here. Alternatively, if it has not been possible by Thursday to agree upon draft statement of principles or some alternative intermediate step, I think that cease fire group should then state its inability to propose an intermediate step, and leave way open for other delegations to make whatever proposals they may have in mind. Mounting pressure on United States delegation here

Following for Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: In the light of your comments and suggestions, I have revised the proposed statement of principles and have gone over it with Rau, Jebb, and Gross of United States delegation. Text given below incorporates suggestions from all of them. Gross could not, of course, commit his Government to acceptance, but said that he would send it at once to Washington. Rau has not yet had opportunity to comment on text in this exact form, but it does not differ materially from text he saw earlier today.

2. I think that this text will go far towards assuring Peking Government that subjects which concern them will be discussed in favourable circumstances. If United States Government is prepared to acquiesce in revised text with references to Formosa and representation as agenda items, it will be important to know as soon as possible whether Mr. Nehru will, as we very much hope, be prepared to allow Sir Benegal when Political Committee meets on Thursday to be associated in putting forward draft statement as addition to Cease Fire Group's report.

3. Text of revised draft statement of principles is as follows, text begins:

The objective shall be the achievement, by stages, of the programme outlined below for a cease-fire in Korea, for the establishment of a free and united Korea, and for a peaceful settlement of Far Eastern problems.

1. In order to prevent needless destruction of life and property, and while other steps are being taken to restore peace, a cease-fire should be immediately arranged. Such an arrangement should contain adequate safeguards for ensuring that it will not be used as a screen for mounting a new offensive.

2. If and when a cease-fire occurs in Korea, either as a result of a formal arrangement or, indeed, as a result of a lull in hostilities pending some arrangement, advantage should be taken of it to pursue consideration of further steps to be taken for the restoration of peace.

3. To permit the carrying out of the General Assembly resolution that Korea should be a unified, independent, democratic, sovereign State with a constitution and a Government based on free popular elections, all non-Korean armed forces will be withdrawn, by appropriate stages, from Korea, and appropriate arrangements, in accordance with United Nations principles, will be made for the Korean people to express their own free will in respect of their future Government.

4. Pending the completion of the steps referred to in the preceding paragraph, appropriate interim arrangements, in accordance with United Nations principles, will be made for the administration of Korea and the maintenance of peace and security there.

5. As soon as a cease-fire has been arranged, the General Assembly shall set up an appropriate body, which shall include representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the U.S.S.R. and the People's Republic of China, with a view to the achievement of a settlement of Far Eastern problems, including, among others, those of Formosa and the representation of China in the United Nations. Following for the Prime Minister from Mr. Pearson, Begins: Last evening Sir Gladwyn Jebb showed me a telegram addressed to him from the Foreign Secretary, outlining the decision reached at the Prime Ministers meeting as to the course which should now be followed in regard to Korean and Far Eastern negotiations.[10] My first reaction in getting Jebb's message was one of surprise and bewilderment, almost consternation. In examining the message again, however, I realized that it was ambiguous in character and that until this ambiguity had been removed, I should reserve my own opinion concerning it. For instance, does the message mean that we are to abandon the position which we have taken here, and, indeed, which has been considered as absolutely essential, that the fighting must stop before negotiations begin, or does the message assume that before the steps recommended therein can be taken, a cease-fire in principle must have been agreed on by all parties, including the Chinese Communists. If this latter interpretation is correct, then I think that something can be worked out along the lines of the latest message. Indeed, our revised draft statement, which you received yesterday, does in paragraph 5, go a long way in carrying it out.

2. Jebb, however, has interpreted the message as meaning negotiations begin before a cease-fire is agreed, and has indicated as much to the Americans, whose reaction was one of amazement. He, however, may have been premature in this interpretation.

3. Sir Benegal Rau has given the message another interpretation, but one which is close to Jebb's, namely, that the outstanding questions which the four powers are to consider will include the negotiation of a cease-fire, as well as a negotiation of political problems. If this is the correct interpretation, it means that discussions begin with the Chinese Communists before they have accepted the principle of a cease-fire, but that agreement will be sought first on ways to end the fighting. It should be remembered, however, that the Chinese in Peking have always insisted that they would not, repeat not, stop fighting in Korea until their other demands have been satisfied, and I see no reason to believe that they would be led to depart from that position by the offer of an immediate four-power conference, if the existing draft statement of principles could not lead them to depart from that position.

4. Presumably the course suggested also means that no further steps should be initiated at the United Nations until the four-power discussions of cease-fire and political questions are completed. This would be asking the Americans not to bring forward a condemnatory resolution of any kind in the United Nations for an indefinite period, during part of which, at least, the Chinese Communists would be continuing their attacks on United Nations troops. I do not think that there is much likelihood of the Americans accepting this.

5. Meanwhile, the British Embassy in Washington is discussing the message with the State Department, on the basis of their interpretation. I, however, do not feel that we should do anything further until we get the clear intent of the message established, and for this purpose I have been trying to get Mr. Robertson on the telephone since last evening, succeeding only an hour or so ago. I think it would be unfortunate if we abandoned the position we have taken in regard to the priority for a cease-fire, and accepted the Chinese Communist position of negotiations first and cease-fire later. However, that may not be intended. It is too bad that the message to Jebb was not more specific on this very important point. I hope that the amended statement of principles, which I sent you yesterday by telegram (No. 46 to External) will still be thought by you to be the most satisfactory basis for action in the Political Committee tomorrow. The Americans are still considering this, though their consideration will now be suspended, I assume, pending a clarification of the later message from London. Ends.

CEASE FIRE IN KOREA

Following for Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: As a result of telephone conversations with London, messages from London and discussions in Washington, the situation is now much clearer and, I think, much more satisfactory. Mr. Wrong has just telephoned from Washington that the United States will not oppose paragraph 5 of our statement of principles in its last version, providing that the Indian delegation will be able to join the other two members of the Cease-Fire Group in sponsoring this paragraph and the rest of the statement before the Political Committee of the United Nations tomorrow. The amended paragraph would now include, to meet the Indian point of view, the additional words suggested by Mr. Robertson in his teletype No. 72 of today's date.[1] We have secured American Agreement to the addition of these words, not merely to their substitution in the paragraph in question for the reference to Formosa and Chinese representation. This is more than we expected the United States to agree to, and we feel very pleased here. Paragraph 5 would now read:

Quotation begins:

"As soon as a cease-fire has been arranged, the General Assembly shall set up an appropriate body which shall include representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the U.S.S.R. and the People's Republic of China with a view to the achievement of a settlement in conformity with existing international obligations and the provisions of the United Nations Charter on Far Eastern problems, including, among other things, those of Formosa and of representation of China in the United Nations". Quotation ends.

2. If, however, Mr. Nehru is not in a position to authorize Rau to accept our statement, even with paragraph 5 as above, then the United States would feel that they were freed from their commitment in regard to it. They would, however, not oppose the statement in its earlier form, even if it were agreed to by only two of the three members of the Cease-Fire Group and introduced by them. However, their support of any statement of principles must not be interpreted as precluding them from taking any further steps later, which they may consider desirable. If the Chinese Government in Peking reject the statement of principles, or if no reply is forthcoming from them after a sufficient interval of time for consideration (I gather by "sufficient interval" that would mean, say, until the middle of next week), the U.S.A. would then feel free to introduce in the Political Committee a condemnatory resolution if they desired to do so.

3. I hope very much that in view of the present form of paragraph 5, Mr. Nehru will be able to authorize Rau to associate himself with the statement as a member of the Cease-Fire Group. We must, however, have information on this by tomorrow morning, as the Political Committee meets in the afternoon, when we will have to make some kind of a report. Ends.

KOREAN CEASE-FIRE

Mr. Robertson telephoned this morning from London after the morning session of the Prime Minister's Conference had been completed.[12] They discussed again the statement of principles and agreed on it in its final form, subject to the considerations mentioned below.

1. It was felt that it would have been better if a specific reference had been made to the Cairo Declaration in Paragraph 5, but they agreed that as this was probably now impossible, the point could be made by an interpretative statement by Rau as to what "international obligations" include. I told Mr. Robertson that there was no possibility of getting specific reference to the Cairo Declaration at this stage.

2. They felt that the "appropriate body" referred to in Paragraph 5 should be small, preferably only the Four Powers mentioned in the paragraph. I agreed, but said that here again there should be no change in the present text, as the composition of the body could be determined by the Assembly in due course, and that we should all support a very small body of four or five states.

3. They would have preferred Paragraph 5 to be put after Paragraph 1. I said I would look into this.

4. Mr. Nehru was particularly worried about the beginning of Paragraph 5 — "As soon as a cease-fire has been arranged . . .". He thought that this might be construed by the suspicious Chinese as an American device not to begin political discussions until every detail of the cease-fire arrangement had been formally adopted, and this might take some time. I agreed that I would try to get these words in Paragraph 5 altered to read, "As soon as a cease-fire has been agreed on . . .". If this could not be done, then the three of us could interpret the original words in a sense which might remove Chinese fears.

Mr. Robertson ended by saying that Mr. Nehru had not, however, agreed, when the meeting closed, to authorize Rau to support the statement, but would make up his mind within the next hour or so. As we meet at 3, he didn't have much time.

I at once telephoned Washington to indicate the interpretations that the Indians desired, and told the Embassy to take up at once with the State Department the substitution of the words "agreed on" for "arranged". I also asked them to do their very best to press on the U.S. authorities the fact that they should now not merely abstain, but vote in favour of the statement of principles, if the Indians would sponsor it. Both Mr. Wrong and Mr. Ignatieff will do their best to clear up this point and I will see Gross here about it. Abstention would not be good enough, as the Chinese would use it as an excuse for not paying any attention to the document, on the ground that the Americans had not accepted it.

After these talks, just before lunch, Rau phoned to say that his Prime Minister had agreed that he should sponsor the statement of principles, but he might have to make some interpretative remarks. I told him that I was going to try to get the first line of Paragraph 5 changed, in a way which would meet Mr. Nehru's points. He seemed pleased about this and I, in turn, am very pleased that he will be able to sponsor the statement. It looks as if our main difficulties are now removed.

KOREAN CEASE-FIRE STATEMENT

A difficulty has arisen over the form in which our statement should be approved by the Political Committee, and who should sponsor any resolution of approval. It was our opinion that the resolution should be very short, merely noting, with approval, our statement and forwarding it to Peking for their consideration. Rau, with whom I talked about this matter yesterday, is worried about any formal endorsation by the Committee before the Chinese Communists have considered it. The difficulty here, however, is that if we merely send it to Peking without any resolution of approval, the United States will not then be committed to it, and this would give the Chinese an excuse to say that as the statement has not been approved by the United States and others, they should not be asked to give prior approval to it. Rau appreciated this point. In conversation with Jebb last evening, I suggested that the Cease-Fire Group should not itself sponsor any resolution, because it would deal with their own statement, but that Jebb should try to collect 5 or 6 sponsors and draft a short resolution along the lines indicated above. The sponsors might include a Latin American, a Scandinavian and a couple of Asians.

Meanwhile, we telegraphed a message to London asking Mr. St. Laurent to impress on Mr. Nehru how important it was that Rau should support and vote for any resolution of endorsation.

This morning Jebb telephoned me that he had been trying to arrange a sponsoring group for an endorsation resolution, and was having great difficulty. The Asians, or at least some of them, were anxious to be the exclusive sponsors, and were also anxious to amend the statement itself before it went to Peking, with a view to removing the stipulation that a cease-fire must actually take place before any negotiations begin. This, of course, is a fundamental part of the statement, and without it the Americans naturally will not support it. Apparently they, the Asians, have been influenced by Rau's speech yesterday, saying that the first few lines of Paragraph 5 were unnecessary. Jebb said that Alkhudairy, particularly if he were to be a sponsor of this resolution, would want these lines removed from the statement completely. I told Jebb that this was hopeless, and neither the Americans, nor ourselves, nor the Latin Americans would support a statement amended like this. All our work would have gone for nothing. Jebb also said that the Asians were willing, as a gesture, to include Mexico among the sponsors. I told Jebb that there were only two courses now that seemed to me to make sense. One is that the Asians alone should sponsor the resolution as it stands, or that the Cease-Fire Group itself, notwithstanding the disadvantages of this course, should introduce the sponsoring resolution.

I then telephoned Rau to confirm, if possible, Jebb's fears. Rau was somewhat reassuring. He said that it is true the Asians had been talking about the question of a resolution and its sponsorship, and had come to the conclusion that the sponsors should not include any country which had forces fighting in Korea, as the Chinese might use this as an excuse to state that the resolution and the statement were primarily for the purpose of extricating such forces from their present difficulties. I told Rau that this seemed to be to be not unreasonable, and I suggested to him that he use his influence to have a resolution sponsored by four or five countries, such as Mexico, Sweden, Syria, Burma, and possibly Indonesia. Rau said that he would try to do this. He did not think that the Asians would try to amend the statement, and in this respect was less pessimistic than Jebb. I mentioned to him the possibility of the twelve Asians who had sponsored the earlier resolution now sponsoring the statement of principles. He said that as India was one of these, he himself could not take this action without consulting Nehru, so we returned to the idea of the group of five.

I passed this on to Jebb and he seemed to think that sponsorship by countries not fighting in Korea would be satisfactory, and he agreed to try to get agreement on that basis. He was having a meeting for this purpose at noon.

Please transmit the following message to the High Commissioner for Canada, London, England, Begins:
Following for the Prime Minister from Mr. Pearson, Begins: Our statement of principles was introduced yesterday and got a very good initial reception. It will receive a very large majority when the voting takes place, probably tomorrow. Meanwhile, it is clear that the Russians will do their best to misrepresent it to the Chinese in every possible way. Malik showed this yesterday. It is, therefore, of first importance that the statement should be explained to Peking by more impartial and friendly sources. This presumably means Panikkar. It would, therefore, be very helpful indeed if Mr. Nehru could authorize Panikkar to see Chou En-Lai and put the plan forward to him in the best possible light. Otherwise, he will get only the Russian version. I asked the United Nations Secretariat last evening to telegraph the statement to their representative in Shanghai, and this will be done this morning. He will then send it at once to Peking, so it should be in the hands of the government there today. However, it would be safer if the Indians could telegraph it themselves to Panikkar.

2. Austin made a very good statement yesterday and announced his definite support for the plan, though the United Kingdom representatives here and in Washington felt the night before that the best we could hope for from him was abstention. However, we intervened strongly, both there and through the Embassy in Washington and I think that this had some effect in persuading them to adopt a more positive line. They were also agreeable to a change at the beginning of paragraph 4, which, with Rau's interpretation of that paragraph yesterday, should remove any uneasiness Mr. Nehru has that the political negotiations may be unduly postponed. The main thing now, however, is to bring about a friendly intervention at Peking on behalf of the statement, and that can, I think, be done only by the Indians. Ends.

KOREA

The following is the text of the supplementary report of the group on cease-fire in Korea submitted at yesterday's meeting of the Political Committee by Mr. Pearson on behalf of the group. Text of the report begins:

"The objective shall be the achievement, by stages, of the programme outlined below for a cease-fire in Korea, for the establishment of a free and united Korea, and for a peaceful settlement of Far Eastern problems.

1. In order to prevent needless destruction of life and property, and while other steps are being taken to restore peace, a cease-fire should be immediately arranged. Such an arrangement should contain adequate safeguards for ensuring that it will not be used as a screen for mounting a new offensive.

2. If and when a cease-fire occurs in Korea, either as a result of a formal arrangement or, indeed, as a result of a lull in hostilities pending some such arrangement, advantage should be taken of it to pursue consideration of further steps to be taken for the restoration of peace.

3. To permit the carrying out of the General Assembly resolution that Korea should be a unified, independent, democratic, sovereign state with a constitution and a government based on free popular elections, all non-Korean armed forces will be withdrawn, by appropriate stages, from Korea, and appropriate arrangements, in accordance with United Nations principles, will be made for the Korean people to express their own free will in respect of their future government.

4. Pending the completion of the steps referred to in the preceding paragraph, appropriate interim arrangements, in accordance with United Nations principles, will be made for the administration of Korea and the maintenance of peace and security there.

5. As soon as agreement has been reached on a cease-fire, the General Assembly shall set up an appropriate body which shall include representatives of the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the People's Republic of China with a view to the achievement of a settlement, in conformity with existing international obligations and the provisions of the United Nations Charter, of Far Eastern problems, including, among others, those of Formosa (Taiwan) and of representation of China in the United Nations." 1. At the conclusion of the two meetings on Saturday, 13th January, the Political Committee approved the statement of principles contained in the supplementary report of the cease-fire group by a vote of 50 in favour (including Canada), 7 against and 1 abstention. The negative votes were cast by the Soviet Bloc, Nationalist China and El Salvador. The Philippines abstained, while Costa Rica and Nicaragua were absent. The Committee then adopted an additional proposal asking the Chairman of the Committee, through the Secretary-General, to transmit these principles to the Peking Government, and to ask Peking to inform him as soon as possible whether they accepted these principles "as a basis for the peaceful settlement of the Korean problem and other Far Eastern problems". The vote on this second motion was 45 in favour (including Canada), 5 against (the Soviet Bloc) and 8 abstentions (China, El Salvador, the Philippines and most of the Arab Bloc). It was also understood that, in the event of no reply from Peking, the Chairman should summon the committee at his discretion.

2. Prior to approving the principles of the cease-fire group the Committee adopted a Mexican proposal that the principles should be either approved or rejected in their entirety. The vote on this proposal was 42 in favour (including Canada), 4 against and 9 abstentions. The adoption of this proposal had the effect of ruling out all amendments to the cease-fire group's principles, and was opposed by those delegations which had submitted amendments, or which wished to do so.

3. The two meetings on Saturday were marked by a retreat on the part of the Arab Bloc from the support for the cease-fire group's principles which they had announced on the previous day. This altered position seemed to be due to (a) Israel's sponsorship of a resolution approving the cease-fire group's principles, and (b) annoyance on the part of the Arab Bloc that the twelve-power Asian resolution, of which they had been co-sponsors, had not been given precedence over the principles developed by the cease-fire group. They finally voted in favour of approving the cease-fire group's principles, but with the understanding that they would later re-introduce the twelve-power Asian resolution, in an amended form, if the Peking Government showed a willingness to negotiate on the broad basis of the cease-fire group's principles.

4. The Arab Bloc, plus several of the Asiatic States, also contended that the question of transmitting the cease-fire group's principles to the Peking Government required careful study, and that further time should be given to this question of the method of transmittal. For this reason they supported an Indian proposal for adjourning the Committee, which was defeated by a vote of 13 in favour (the Asian States), 32 against (including Canada) and 10 abstentions. After this vote against adjournment, the Committee adopted the motion for transmitting the cease-fire group's principles in the manner given above.

5. Tsiang of China made a bitter speech against the cease-fire group's principles and asserted that they amounted to a "sell-out" of the United Nations. In particular he charged that paragraph 5 of the principles was tantamount to asking the Peking Government "how do you want Taiwan — rare, medium or well-done?" The Philippine representative, Romulo, spoke in a somewhat similar fashion but abstained on the principles, instead of voting against them. The vote of the representative of El Salvador against approving the principles was due to the fact that he had submitted a number of amendments to them, and the Committee had decided not to consider any amendments.

6. In explaining his vote against approving the principles, Malik of the Soviet Union confined himself to the formal argument that he could not support them because neither the Peking Government nor the North Korean Government were participating in the work of the Committee. At the meetings on 13th January he did not speak against the substance of the principles in the same manner that he had done at the meeting on 11th January (see paragraph 7 of my teletype No. 56†).

7. No date has been fixed for the next meeting of the Committee, and this will be determined either by (a) the reply of the Peking Government, or (b) the decision of the Chairman, if no reply from Peking is forthcoming.

1. Ross of the United States delegation came to lunch with me today, and although he said in advance that he had nothing particularly on his mind, I found him wholly preoccupied with the question of steps to be taken if Peking Government will not accept the cease fire proposals. He gave me the text of an outline of proposals which he said represents the current thinking of their delegation. Text is contained in my immediately following teletype.

2. You will notice that this text, although it is a modification of the points outlined in my teletype No. 33 of January 7th, retains the two essential points that Communist China will be designated an aggressor and that the Collective Measures Committee will be given the task of determining appropriate measures to be taken against the Chinese. The Collective Measures Committee will, however, report to the Assembly rather than directly to member states.

3. Ross said that he thought alternatives between conciliatory attitude towards Chinese and firm resistance had been too sharply placed. No one was really suggesting a choice between offering the Chinese a peaceful solution on reasonable terms and resisting their aggression. In fact this choice could not be made, and both courses of action were necessary. Draft resolution which was being contemplated, therefore, both held out the hope of a negotiated settlement and also showed intention to take firm action so long as Chinese persisted in their course.

4. In regard to the finding of aggression, I said that it seemed to me the Chinese would not be turned from their present course until they ran into trouble of some kind, either in their relations with the Russians or in their relations with the free world. The important question was how, in showing firmness against Chinese expansion, the free world could avoid on the one hand falling into disunity, and on the other, closing the door against a possible accommodation. The arguments against incorporating a specific charge of aggression in the proposed resolution were, therefore, that support might be lost in the vote, and that the way might be made harder for the Chinese eventually to come to terms. In regard to the first of these arguments, Ross suggested that it was possible already to calculate the vote with fair accuracy, and he was not sure that modifications in the wording would greatly affect the result. He did not think the Indians and Indonesians and one or two other Asian states would vote for the resolution in any case. The Arab vote would probably be split. He seemed to doubt whether any wording would secure the support of Sweden. He hoped, however, that other states would be prepared to support a resolution along the lines the United States was suggesting. In regard to the second objection, he thought that, if ever the Chinese made up their minds to seek an accommodation, they would not be prevented from doing so by concern about the language of resolutions. In the meantime, he thought that great advantage would flow from the free world showing that it is prepared to face the realities of the situation in Korea, and to call things by their proper names. In the course of developing this point, he expressed very strongly the opinion that a voluntary withdrawal from Korea, or a withdrawal upon dishonourable terms, would lead to disaster elsewhere in Asia. Referring specifically to arguments in favour of withdrawal now being advanced in the United States, he said that, failing a satisfactory settlement with the Chinese, it seemed to him only reasonable to pin down as many Chinese forces as possible in Korea for as long as possible and thus try to prevent Peking engaging upon other ventures.

5. I said that my questions should not be taken as indicating an expression of opinion, and that I would send the outline which he had given me to Ottawa.

POINTS FOR A RESOLUTION RE KOREA

1. The General Assembly should note that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China has rejected efforts to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea with a view to peaceful settlement, and that its armed forces continue their invasion of Korea and their large-scale attacks upon United Nations forces there;

2. The General Assembly should note that the Security Council, because of lack of unanimity of the permanent members, has failed to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in regard to Chinese Communist intervention in Korea;

3. The General Assembly should find that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China has committed aggression in Korea;

4. The General Assembly should call upon the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to cause its forces and nationals in Korea to cease hostilities against the United Nations forces and to withdraw from Korea;

5. The General Assembly should affirm the determination of the United Nations to continue its action to meet the aggression in Korea;

6. The General Assembly should call upon all states and authorities to continue to lend every assistance to the United Nations in such action;

7. The General Assembly should call upon all states and authorities to refrain from giving any assistance to the aggressors in Korea;

8. The General Assembly should request the Collective Measures Committee, as a matter of urgency, to consider what additional measures should now be employed to meet this aggression, and to make recommendations to the General Assembly thereon;

9. The General Assembly should affirm that it continues to be the policy of the United Nations to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea with a view to peaceful settlement and the achievement of United Nations objectives in Korea by peaceful means, and requests _____ at any suitable opportunity to use its good offices to this end." KOREA — ACTION IN UNITED NATIONS

1. At the regular meeting at the State Department today Hickerson reported the information just received about the Chinese reply to the Cease-Fire Committee's proposal. He said that while the text was not completely translated in New York the substance of it was clear and that it amounted to a complete rejection. The counter proposal included in the reply was wholly unacceptable, and he was sure the governments represented at the meeting would agree with this.

2. I was asked to stay after the meeting for a private talk with him and with Rusk, and this report is an amalgam of what was said at the meeting and the private discussion. Hickerson showed me the brief statement just issued by Mr. Acheson confirming the line he took at the meeting.

3. He said that arrangements were in train for the Political Committee to meet tomorrow to discuss further steps. The United States view on what should be done was unchanged and a draft resolution had been sent to New York for discussion with other delegations. The State Department hoped that tomorrow the resolution would be considered by the Political Committee and that a vote would not be delayed for more than three or four days at longest.

4. In reply to questions he said that another effort at a peaceful solution without first any direct condemnation of Chinese intervention was unthinkable. The United Nations had done all it can honorably do to stop the fighting and should now put the facts squarely on record.

5. Rusk emphasized that Chinese action in Korea was only a part of a more general Chinese threat in the Far East with particular reference to Indo-China. Evasion at this stage would only make matters worse.

6. Privately they both discussed with me the state of Congressional and public opinion. Hickerson said that what had decided them finally to vote for the statement of principles was your urgent appeal; otherwise they would have abstained. He and Rusk had taken a battering when before the Foreign Relations Committee yesterday because of this vote. Rusk admitted that they could now publicly explain their motives in supporting the resolution, which they had been unable to do before the Chinese answer for fear of undermining the proposals.

7. They emphasized that the central issues in the debate on foreign policy have become the value to the United States of participating in any system of collective security, including the North Atlantic alliance. This concurs with my own opinion, and, of course, at present what is done about Korea by the United Nations is the hottest issue. Rusk is much concerned over Nehru's attitude and the impossibility of persuading him to exercise his great influence in Asia in a positive sense. He considers that a strong lead from Nehru in the right direction would be worth many divisions in checking Chinese adventures.

8. As to the United States resolution, they intend to press hard for its adoption by as large a majority as possible. They are unwilling to accept any alterations of substance, but are prepared to consider amendments in its language.

9. I am reporting separately on the military situation.

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: In view of the reply of the Peking Government,[13] my strong recommendation is that we should not support any move which may be introduced in New York for a further effort for a peaceful settlement in Korea and should vote for a resolution on the lines proposed by the United States. Apart from other reasons for this course, I think that the effect on United States opinion, especially at the beginning of a most important session of Congress, would be very serious if there is any further delay in the direct condemnation of Chinese intervention. I think also that readiness on our part to support the United States position after the failure of your great efforts to secure a cease-fire would influence a number of other delegations.

2. I forgot to include in my earlier message of today a point made in my discussion with Rusk about the Indian attitude. He said sadly that the United States certainly ought to send large quantities of food to India, where people are starving, but added that the position taken by Nehru would make it difficult, if not impossible, for them to discharge this humanitarian obligation. This was one of the reasons why he hoped Nehru would change his line. Unless he does, there will be difficulty in getting funds from Congress. Ends.

KOREA

I spoke to Ross this morning on the basis of the United States memorandum containing points for a resolution on Korea, repeated to you in my teletype No. 70 of January 15th, and suggested certain revisions for his consideration, as follows:

Paragraph 3: for the words "... has committed aggression in Korea", substitute the words: "... has caused and permitted its forces and nationals to participate in and assist the aggression in Korea".

Paragraph 5: the phrase "... in Korea" should be placed after the word "action", to read: "... continue its action in Korea to meet the aggression".

Paragraph 6 to be revised to read: "... to continue to lend every assistance to the United Nations action in Korea".

2. I also said that we would like to see paragraph 9 altered in such a way as to indicate that the offer to negotiate a Far Eastern settlement was still open. I pointed out that the present wording referred only to the situation in Korea and suggested the possibility of a revision along the following lines: "... it continues to be the policy of the United Nations to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea with a view to the achievement of United Nations objectives in Korea by peaceful means and the peaceful settlement of Far Eastern questions, following a cessation of hostilities in Korea, upon the basis of principles approved in the Political Committee on January 14th, 1951, and requests ...".

3. Ross asked what the intention was of the change suggested in paragraph 3, and I said that what we had in mind was to limit the finding of the resolution to the Korean situation and to focus upon Korea any action which might arise out of it.

4. Ross also asked whether we had any views in regard to the individual or group to be named in the last paragraph to continue the work of conciliation. I said I had no instructions in this regard but two ideas occurred to me. One was that, if there were any disposition to continue the existing Cease Fire Group, the refusal of Peking to communicate with the group should not worry us too much, since I thought Peking quite capable of making use of an instrument tomorrow which it had rejected today if it wished to do so. I also suggested that they might consider naming in paragraph 9 six of the seven states which had been mentioned in the communication from Peking, that is, United States of America, United Kingdom, France, India, U.S.S.R., Egypt. By combining a reference to the statement of principles with the designation of a group conforming to the Chinese suggestions, it would be made abundantly clear to the Chinese that they could at any moment pick up the offer of a negotiated settlement which has been made to them.

3. Ross asked about sponsorship, and I said that you were prepared to give favourable consideration to sponsorship, but that your decision would, of course, depend upon the text that finally emerged and the list of sponsors. Ross then asked whether or not our attitude towards sponsorship was directly related to that of the United Kingdom. I told him that I did not think this was the case, and that we would be more interested in the whole composition of the group of sponsors rather than in the inclusion or omission of any particular state.

6. Langenhove called during the morning to enquire about our attitude towards sponsorship, and said that he would be speaking to Van Zealand on the telephone. He also said the United States delegation were sending him a full text of their proposed resolution which he expected to receive almost immediately.

7. Ross did not offer to send me such a text and I did not ask for it. He said they would take our suggestions into consideration and would let us know their intention. He did not think now, however, that they would insist on tabling a resolution this afternoon, but would wish to proceed tomorrow. He told me that they had been informed by someone in the Secretariat that you intended to ask for a postponement until Monday. I said I had no reason to believe this to be true and that I was expecting you in New York tomorrow morning. I also told Ross that we were contemplating suggesting, at some stage, that a request for clarification of certain parts of their text be addressed to Peking. Ross thought this was a function which might be taken up by the continuing group named in the last paragraph of the resolution.

1. Will you please have the following urgent personal message from the Prime Minister delivered to Pandit Nehru who I understand is now in Paris. Message begins.

2. I feel sure you share with me very grave concern because of the ambiguous nature of the Peking Government's reply to the United Nations proposals and of the serious results which might follow very rapidly in the United Nations and the further deterioration in the Asian and world situation.

3. There are several points in the Peking reply, the meaning of which is susceptible of varying interpretations and it seems to me that we should find out at once what the Chinese intend.

4. The points I have in mind are:

(a) In paragraph 1 of the Chinese reply does the reference to negotiations "on the basis of the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Korea" include Chinese "volunteers"? Malik has on a previous occasion indicated in the First Political Committee that Chinese troops are included in this formula but we have never had a clear statement from Peking to this effect.

(b) In paragraph 2 of the Chinese reply it is stated that "if a cease fire comes into effect without first conducting negotiations to fix the conditions therefor, negotiations after the cease fire may entail endless discussions without solving any problem". This, taken in conjunction with the statement later in the same paragraph "that the principle of a cease fire first and negotiations afterwards would only help the United States to maintain and extend its aggression", might seem to convey the impression that the Chinese objection is to a cease fire preceding negotiations leading up to a cease fire. If this were their real objection it would be easy to reassure them on this point. Indeed the Cease Fire Committee have already made it quite clear through General Wu that the conditions for a cease fire would have to be fully discussed and agreed before the Cease Fire would actually become effective. Many may fear, however, that this is not the real meaning of the Chinese and that what they are demanding is that negotiations on the broad political questions at issue should precede a cease fire. This interpretation could be borne out by the reference in paragraph 2 of the Chinese note to the inacceptability to the Chinese Government of the principle of "the arrangement of a cease fire in Korea first and the conducting of negotiations among the various countries concerned afterwards". If the Chinese mean that the negotiation over political issues should take place prior to the cease fire, this would be quite inacceptable as it would imply that negotiations would be carried on for a peaceful settlement while military operations were being continued to bring about a settlement by the force of arms. The ambiguity in this paragraph makes it, in my view, desirable that the Chinese meaning should be clarified beyond the possibility of misunderstanding.

If fighting cannot be stopped at once it might be possible, it seems to me, to visualize the simultaneous suspension of fighting with the opening of the conference with the understanding that the resumption of the fighting by either side would end and defeat the efforts to reach a settlement by negotiations. In the meantime there would have to be an agreed lull in hostilities, otherwise we should again find ourselves in the position of conducting negotiations under military duress.

(c) The reference in paragraph 2 of the Chinese note to the Cairo and Potsdam Declarations seems to me to be sufficiently covered by Rau's explicit statement in the Political Committee that existing international obligations referred to the Cairo and Potsdam Declarations.

(d) In point (c) of paragraph 3 of the Chinese proposals, it is stated that "the rightful place of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China in the United Nations should be established as from the beginning of the Seven-Power Conference". This statement is obscure. Does it mean that this Chinese government demands as a precondition to agreeing to a conference that it be formally recognized as the spokesman of China in the United Nations? If so, there seems no possibility that in existing circumstances their demand could be met. On the other hand, the conference itself would necessarily imply a de facto recognition which, unless the conference became abortive, would, in my opinion, have to be followed by formal recognition and it might well be that this is what is intended in the note.

5. I think you will agree that it is important that there be clarification on these points immediately in relation to proceedings in the Political Committee in the next day or two. Your Ambassador in Peking is clearly in the best position to seek such clarification.

6. If you agree, would you think it advisable to ask Panikkar to see Chou En-Lai immediately?

7. The U.S. may now press for a resolution condemning Communist China. The wording of such a resolution should, in my opinion, be very carefully considered with a view, if possible, to finding a text which we can support. If some resolution along these lines cannot now be avoided, I should hope that it would be made clear in the body of the resolution that this does not close the door to a further effort towards a peaceful solution. I do not think that the U.S. intend to exclude such a further effort even if they ask for the passage of a condemnatory resolution. I am sure that you will agree with me that the door should be left open for a further attempt at reaching a settlement upon which the peace of Asia and perhaps of the world may depend. With this objective in mind, I think any resolution should contain a specific reference to the principles contained in the U.N. communication to the Chinese government of January 13.

8. Pearson is leaving today for New York and will be discussing our ideas regarding the timing and text of any such a resolution with other delegations there, including, of course, your own. Message ends.

Following for the Minister, Begins: The Acting Indian High Commissioner left with the Prime Minister this morning a telegram dated January 18 to the Prime Minister from Mr. Nehru. This telegram crossed the telegram from Mr. St. Laurent to Mr. Nehru. The message from Mr. Nehru to the Prime Minister reads as follows:

I have seen Press Reports of Chinese reply to Political Committee's proposals. I do not consider the reply to be outright rejection. It is partly acceptance, partly request for elucidation, partly counter-proposal, and leaves room for further negotiations. All of us must have time to consider them before determining future line of action. According to Press Reports, United States have already pronounced Chinese reply unacceptable and asked that meeting of Political Committee be called, presumably to declare China Aggressor. Any such move will shut door to negotiation completely and make War inevitable. This would be contrary to policy which you and we decided to follow in Commonwealth Conference. I think there is room for negotiation and we should take advantage of this. I would request you strongly to urge Washington not to compound matters. Ends.

My telegram No. 17 of January 19th.†
Following message is from Mr. Nehru to Prime Minister, Begins: Thank you very much for your message which I have just received through your Ambassador in Paris and which has crossed mine to you of yesterday. I am telegraphing points mentioned by you at once to our Ambassador in Peking for clarification and shall telegraph result to you as soon as I hear from him. Such information as I have from him suggests that, although tone of Chinese reply is firm, Chinese Government desire peaceful settlement by negotiation. It is of the utmost importance, therefore, that door be kept open, and I am most grateful for your statesmanlike approach.

As I told you in my message of yesterday I feel that resolution condemning Communist China, however worded, would have most unfortunate consequences and probably make negotiated settlement impossible. We must, therefore, endeavour to avoid precipitate action and allow time for full consideration of Chinese reply, with aid of elucidations that seem necessary.

With best wishes. Ends.

1. At the meeting of the Political Committee at 3 p.m., Thursday, 18th January, the first speaker was Austin who, as anticipated, outlined the ingredients of a resolution condemning China as an aggressor, but did not submit the text of such a resolution. Austin's five-point "programme of action" contained no new elements, and the five points stressed by him were similar to points 3, 4, 5, 8 and 9 of the text contained in my teletype No. 70. He described the Chinese reply as "a final rebuff", and said that the Chinese counter proposals were completely unacceptable. He summed up his remarks by saying that, if the United Nations did not take action to resist this aggression, "we should destroy here and now the principle of collective security on which the safety of our nations rests".

Correction for:

TENTATIVE REVISION OF UNITED STATES RESOLUTION ON KOREA DATED JANUARY 19, 1951

This revision was telephoned by the Canadian Permanent Delegate to the United Nations, New York.

Revision agreed ad referendum by United States, United Kingdom, France, Australia and Canada.

The General Assembly

1. Noting that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China has rejected all U.N. proposals to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea with a view to peaceful settlement, and that its armed forces continue their invasion of Korea and their large-scale attacks upon United Nations forces there;

2. Noting that the Security Council, because of lack of unanimity of the permanent members, has failed to exercise its primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security in regard to Chinese Communist intervention in Korea; (the United States is disposed to omit this paragraph)

3. Finds that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, by giving direct aid and assistance to those who were already committing aggression in Korea and by engaging in hostilities against United Nations forces there, has itself engaged in aggression in Korea;

4. Calls upon the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to cause its forces and nationals in Korea to cease hostilities against the United Nations forces and to withdraw from Korea;

5. Affirms the determination of the United Nations to continue its action in Korea to meet the aggression there;

6. Calls upon all states to continue to lend every assistance in Korea to the United Nations action there;

7. Calls upon all states to refrain from giving any assistance to the aggressors in Korea;

8. Requests a committee composed of the members of the Collective Measures Committee, as a matter of urgency, to consider additional measures to be employed to meet this aggression and to make a report thereon to the Political and Security Committee with a view to recommendations to the General Assembly.

9. Affirms that it continues to be the policy of the United Nations to seek to present [sic] the extension of the present conflict (the United States may balk at this language) and to bring about a cessation of hostilities in Korea with a view to the achievement of United Nations objectives in Korea by peaceful means and the peaceful settlement of other Far Eastern questions following a cessation of hostilities in Korea and requests the President to designate forthwith two persons who would meet with him at any suitable opportunity to use its good offices to this end.

Following from Pearson, Begins: When I arrived in New York Friday morning, I found that a meeting had been arranged in the offices of the United Kingdom delegation, in order to consider draft resolution on Korea, and I went directly from the train to Jebb's office with Riddell. Gross and Ross, from the United States delegation, were present, together with Shann from the Australian delegation, and Lacoste from the French delegation.

2. Jebb had just received instructions to press for the division of the resolution into two parts in order that agreement could be reached on the measures to be taken under the second part of the resolution before action was taken in the Assembly. He was, however, prepared to accept the language of the first part of the draft resolution, in which a finding of aggression was contained, without amendment.

3. The revised text which resulted from our discussions, and which all those present agreed to refer to their governments, is already known to you.[14] In the course of the discussion Gross and Ross persistently held out against efforts to qualify in any material degree the finding of aggression against the Chinese. They also resisted any language which might seem to imply a commitment never in any circumstances to carry United Nations action beyond the borders of Korea, though they were quite prepared to state, publicly if necessary, that they did not regard a draft resolution as in any way constituting an authority to the Unified Command to undertake operations of any kind elsewhere than in Korea.

4. Gross and Ross seemed genuinely anxious to reach an accommodation with other delegations, but it was clear that they were severely restricted by the rigid instructions which they are now receiving. On some occasions it seemed to me that the way in which they expressed these instructions reflected a determination in the State Department to remain free to take strong action against China, if, in their opinion, the circumstances and the military situation in Korea warranted such action. They indicated, for example, that the United States Government now took the view that a new and separate act of aggression, for which the Chinese Communists were responsible, had taken place, and they treated with some reserve the desire that we and the French expressed to base our current action on events in Korea which had originated in June, and which had already been denounced; emphasizing in the wording of any resolution that we were condemning the Chinese for participating in an aggression already committed than for a new and separate aggression. They also made it clear that they wished the United States to have a free hand to take unilaterally whatever action it considered necessary against the Chinese, even if that action should not be decided upon or authorized by the United Nations, though they explained that no such unilateral action was contemplated. Gross, who accepted for reference to Washington a number of significant amendments in the original text, kept expressing misgiving over the effect of these modifications upon the sources from which pressure upon the State Department is now being exercised.

5. After yesterday afternoon's meeting of the Political Committee, I attended a meeting with United States, United Kingdom, French and Australian representatives at which Gross reported the views of Acheson and the State Department on the amendments we had suggested in the morning. My immediately following telegram contains the text of a draft resolution as amended by the Americans in the light of Acheson's views. Gross made the following explanations:

Paragraph 1. The State Department was neutral about this, but they were under strong pressure from the Latin Americans to include some such paragraph to head off a legal debate on the authority of the General Assembly.

Paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5. Acheson was prepared to accept the redrafts of these paragraphs, but Gross and Ross pointed out that paragraph 3 was not the "condemnation" of aggression which Congress and the American people were demanding and emphasized that if they were left to sponsor the resolution themselves or with the Latin Americans, they would go back to the more direct formula which they very much preferred. Certainly they could not consider any change to the words "participate in aggression".

Paragraph 6. The State Department would strongly prefer to go back to the original draft for a reason not mentioned at the morning meeting, that is that assistance was not limited to Korea, in fact, for it included bases in Japan and naval facilities all over the world. Gross emphasized that this preference indicated no intention to extend the hostilities. The omission of "there" was purely for grammatical reasons and had no other significance.

Paragraph 7. The State Department thought "and authorities" should be reinstated so that the paragraph would have universal application without any possible quibble. There might otherwise be suggestions that the question of recognition was tied up with the question of what constitutes a state, as, for instance, in the case of Japan. This was the language of the six-power resolution, and any change would invite speculation.

Paragraph 8. The State Department thought it a mistake to refer to the Political Committee. In the normal course the report would be made to the General Assembly which would ask the Political Committee to take whatever action it saw fit. There was no "political difference" here.

Paragraph 9. Acheson thought that a reference to anything but Korea here would be interpreted as a "soft retrogressive action". He much preferred the original American draft, but would accept the wording put forward in the following telegram. Acheson had been under heavy criticism for agreeing to broad discussion, and he wasn't prepared to take any more of "this kind of punishment". Gross said very specifically that Acheson had asked him to say again that the position of the United States remained as it had been. They did not construe and would not construe this resolution as extending any authority over and above that contained in existing resolutions; and their policy on the bombing of Manchuria remained what it was in the President's last statement on the subject. When Gross at this point said that the Secretary could not accept any change that suggested following further "the line of appeasement", I replied that public opinion in other countries was very worried about the new step involved in a formal condemnation which was the initial step on a "line of new commitments", leading possibly to full scale conflict with China. Gross agreed that there was danger in following either line.

6. Gross said that the State Department felt it was absolutely necessary to table the resolution tomorrow (Saturday). I said we would not be in a position to sponsor the resolution under these circumstances, but that did not mean that we would oppose it or even abstain in the vote. I explained that if we were not sponsoring, I would feel more free in explaining our position and interpreting the resolution. Jebb said that the omission of any reference to the "principles" in the last paragraph would affect Bevin's attitude. Both he and Lacoste, however, said that they would refer the new draft immediately to their governments. Shann indicated after the meeting that he thought Australia would be co-sponsoring.

7. Gross asked what we would think of the United States sponsoring the resolution alone. Shann and Lacoste thought the absence of co-sponsors would have a bad effect and would influence the vote in support. Gross himself thought the effect on American opinion would be bad. When Jebb asked what the American attitude would be if amendments were proposed, Gross said that they would not accept them. He was obviously under instruction to be decisive. He recognized that they might lose support in some quarters if they persisted with their own draft, but he said they were being pressed very hard in the other direction by the Latin Americans. His attitude was that the United States was prepared to go through with the kind of resolution they wanted regardless of the amount of support they received.

8. When Gross explained that the American people considered any further talk of principles of negotiation as "churning over the same kind of weakness", I said again that there was a psychological factor to be considered on the other side. Many other peoples considered that the condemnation of China was a very important step which might have very far-reaching consequences, and in judging those consequences they had to take into consideration the statements of very important people in the United States, such as General O'Donnell. Gross made a rude comment about General O'Donnell, and again showed understanding of the difficulties that others might have. I am afraid such understanding, however, here and in Washington is very much subordinated to the necessity the Americans feel of satisfying Congress and public opinion by following a tough condemnatory line with China. Ends.

Following from Pearson, Begins: At a meeting this morning, attended by Riddell and Holmes, including United States, United Kingdom, French, Australian representatives, Lacoste reported that he had not received instructions and that he could not possibly be a co-sponsor today, although it was possible he might be in a position to co-sponsor on Monday. During the discussion he indicated that it was improbable France would co-sponsor if the text remained as contained in my teletype No. 87 of January 20th.

2. Jebb said that the Foreign Office was maintaining the view that the resolution should be divided into two parts, and he had been instructed not to co-sponsor.

3. Shann said that Australia would co-sponsor. Before the meeting Shann told us that he had received directly contrary instructions from Spender in Canberra and from Menzies in London, but he was following those from his own Minister. Gross said that they could not possibly delay tabling the resolution. On the understanding that they would have a fairly representative group of co-sponsors, they had decided to put forward the text he had given us Friday night (my teletype No. 87) and not to revert to their original proposals. The co-sponsors in addition to Australia would be Cuba, Uruguay, Colombia, Peru, Greece and Turkey, all of whom would prefer a stronger original draft but would go along with Friday night revision. The Philippines and Thailand were awaiting instructions but would probably co-sponsor. South Africa and the Netherlands were almost possibles. Lacoste and Jebb said, however, that the Netherlands instructions were to co-sponsor if either France or the United Kingdom did so as well. When Lacoste asked the American attitude on making changes to broaden support, Gross said the State Department, after nursing the illusion for some time that they might draw in some of the Asians by careful wording, now believe that no changes in the language would affect those who are determined to abstain.

4. In the course of the meeting Riddell said that the text as submitted by the United States delegation late Friday had been communicated to the Prime Minister, but we had not yet had an opportunity to learn his views. We had reason to believe, however, that two amendments which we had previously suggested concerning the finding of aggression and the settlement of Far Eastern questions would seem more important to the Prime Minister now than they had previously. One of these amendments had been incorporated only in partial form, and the other had not been incorporated at all. We had therefore, no reason to believe therefore that we would be in a position to sponsor as a result of further instructions.

5. Later in the discussion, in reply to a question concerning amendments, Riddell said that our proposals for revision had been made not simply for the purpose of gathering support, but because we thought the proposed text more clearly represented the policy which the Canadian Government thought acceptable in the circumstances. He said he was not sure whether this attitude could be made clear in the Canadian statement on the resolution or, alternatively, whether it might be considered necessary to introduce amendments. He said he was inclined to think that the former would be the case. Ends.

Following from Matthews, Begins: State Department asked to have someone attend this afternoon to let us hear text of a message sent to their delegation in New York outlining the provisions the United States would advocate in the recommendations of the Collective Measures Committee. Their message is to be repeated to United States Embassy in Ottawa. State Department do not know when or how fully the contents will be passed on to our delegation or to the Department.

2. The memorandum was described as containing the "tentative views" of the United States Government which are "sufficiently crystallized" to form the basis of discussions.

3. The memorandum comments on possible sanctions that might be recommended by the Collective Measures Committee under three heads as follows:

(a) Military

The United States has not and will continue not to advocate the "present extension" of the area of hostilities. The United States does not consider that the passage of the proposed resolution condemning China as an aggressor would constitute authorization of extension of hostilities to the Chinese mainland nor would it constitute permission to bomb China within the meaning of the President's statement. If the resolution is passed the United States does not "in the present circumstances contemplate asking the Collective Measures Committee to recommend any military operations against Chinese territories".

At the request of General Marshall a caveat has been added stating that the United States Government as the Unified Command, has always maintained it must reserve the right to take action essential to protect United Nations forces under its command e.g. in the event of large scale air attacks against United Nations forces from Manchurian bases there must be freedom to bomb the air fields from which the attacks are mounted: if Chinese Communist forces attack outside of Korea the United Command must be free to counter attack.

State Department points out that in the event of an extension of hostilities of the kind referred to they would consult with other countries, particularly those whose troops were involved.

(b) Economic

The memorandum points out that the United States has applied a complete trade embargo and would wish the Collective Measures Committee to explore the possibility of recommending economic sanctions by all members of the United Nations. The United States is aware that some countries would have strong objections to a full embargo and therefor to preserve the greatest unity possible would be willing to accept selective embargo covering key items for the Chinese Army or directly serving war potential — this should include petroleum products, munitions, equipment and commodities directly employed in the production of munitions. These items are in the United States view an irreducible minimum.

Commenting on this it was pointed out that the proposals did not go further than the present practice of the Western nations but it is considered that approval of the present practice is desirable.

(c) Political

While the United States would consider itself justified in asking for a rupture of relations by those countries that have already recognized Communist China they realize such action would be just a forward gesture and would be resisted strongly by several countries. They therefor propose that the Collective Measures Committee should recommend that no additional countries should recognize the Chinese Communist Government and that that Government should not be seated in any United Nations organization.

It is also proposed the Committee should recommend that the Assembly adopt a resolution that United Nations should not recognize any territorial gains resulting from Chinese Communist aggression.

4. Commenting on these proposals State Department said they hoped that their adoption would hamper China in future campaigns, would result in a greater drain on Russian resources and might help to persuade China to change the terms upon which she would be ready to negotiate a settlement. Ends.

TELEGRAM 86 Ottawa, January 20, 1951

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Following for Minister from Heeney, Begins: Further study in the Department of the texts of telegrams 84† and 85† of January 19 from New York containing Hutchison's[15] account of his interview with Vice-Minister Chang and the summary of Panikkar's interview with Chou En-Lai do not in our opinion bear out the view that the Chinese attitude is clearly and uncompromisingly negative.[16] This applies in particular to their attitude on the crucial question of whether the negotiation on political issues should follow the cease-fire or not. While the Chinese may be deliberately confusing this issue, there is at least a possibility that genuine misunderstanding exists and that there is a confusion in their minds between negotiations leading up to a cease-fire and negotiations on the political issues. In this connection it should be noted that Chou En-Lai is reported as having said to Panikkar that "as regards Korea, cease-fire must in practice be reached by three stages — agreement in principle, negotiations on conditions and implementation". In this connection Chou En-Lai quoted from the text of the Chinese reply "no matter what the agenda and substance of negotiations are if a cease-fire should be arranged without being preceded by negotiations to determine conditions for a cease-fire then negotiations after cease-fire would be drawn out in endless discussions without solving any problem". With this general proposition we would, I suppose, be in agreement. What we fear, of course, is the main political negotiations being conducted under military duress. We have as yet no unequivocal indication that such is the real Chinese intention. While even a slender doubt on this all important point remains, it should surely be cleared up.

Perhaps it is worthwhile at this point summarising our own view of what would be an acceptable basis for opening negotiations. We do agree with the Chinese that the first steps should be those which they suggest, agreement in principle to a cease-fire, negotiations of conditions and implementation. These negotiations would presumably be under-taken by a new United Nations Cease-Fire Committee and concurrently as to detail by the U.N. military authorities on the spot. During this period of negotiation it is to be hoped that there would be a lull in hostilities in Korea but we could hardly demand this as a formal pre-condition as the Cease-Fire Committee has already shown itself willing to discuss conditions for a cease-fire with the Chinese representatives in New York while fighting was going on in Korea.

[16] Voir/See DBPO, Series II, Volume IV, p. 310.

The implementation of the cease-fire and the opening of the Seven-Power Conference could be simultaneous (preparations for the conference could proceed concurrently with the cease-fire negotiations). The conference would meet with an agenda agreed on in advance, the first item of which would be the question of Chinese representation in the U.N.

In our opinion this programme would not represent any departure from the U.N. communication of January 13 to the Chinese Government but would be a spelling out the practical consequences of that message. Our doubt is whether the message has been clearly understood in these terms by the Chinese and whether they would in fact turn down a proposition of this kind. It may be that they would do so because they have already made up their minds in favour of war. It may be that they are genuinely afraid of a trap by entering into which they would lose military advantage and that when the Americans had built up forces they would break off negotiations and return to the offensive. On the other hand, it would always be open to the Chinese at any stage, either in the cease-fire negotiations or the conference to break off negotiations themselves and to return to the offensive. The American and Far Eastern Division think that there is a substantial element of fear in the Chinese position — that they fear a war with the U.S. but dare not show this feeling. If this is so, the case is one which calls for delicate handling. The more so as the Russians are no doubt continually playing on Chinese fears. It must be recalled that it was the Soviet Union which jumped the gun in turning down the U.N. proposals of January 13 before the Chinese had a chance to reply to them. As you recall this was done by Malik in the First Committee and also by articles in Pravda. It may be that some of the obscurities in the Chinese reply are dictated by their necessity of meeting Soviet pressure (and ensuring the delivery of Soviet aid in the event of war), while at the same time putting out faint feelers in the direction of a peaceful solution which they may really desire.

The above considerations all point in our view at the desirability of delaying a condemnatory resolution in the Political Committee until further clarifications have been obtained from Peking. Other arguments pointing in the same direction are:

(a) We are still relying on Hutchinson's summary of Panikkar's account of his interview with Chou En-Lai. We should certainly see Panikkar's own account of this very important conversation with the Chinese Foreign Minister before taking action in the Political Committee.

(b) We have now had a reply from Nehru to the Prime Minister's message indicating that Panikkar will be instructed to seek further clarification from Peking. In view of the obscurities in the Chinese reply to which reference has been made above, we should await this clarification. Moreover, we would be in a somewhat awkward position vis-à-vis Nehru if we voted for the condemnatory resolution before the Indian Ambassador in Peking had had time to get clarification which we ourselves have requested.

(c) Nehru reiterates in his latest message his view that the passage of a condemnatory resolution would "probably make negotiated settlement impossible". This view must be given full weight insofar as it affects the prospect of further attempt at a peaceful solution following on a condemnatory resolution.

We are well aware of the strong pressure from the American side to press forward with a condemnatory resolution. You will know better than we do what chances they have of obtaining the necessary two-thirds majority in the Committee. Meanwhile, we feel that however faint may be the chances of agreement, we should if at all possible wait until we have a perfectly clearcut negative by the Chinese to the proposals of January 13 before proceeding to a vote. We do not feel that, on the basis of the material available to us, we have at present a firm Chinese turn-down, especially on the crucial point of negotiations preceding or following the cease-fire.

Menon called me in this afternoon to say that there was no answer yet from Panikkar but to explain Nehru's views pending this. Nehru much appreciates Canada's efforts. While he acknowledges difficulty of delaying United Nations resolution when Chinese procrastinate in answering, he points out that, as in fact there seems to be no present fighting, there is no immediate urgency.

2. Nehru's telegram to Panikkar following his message of January 19th to Mr. St. Laurent had to be relayed through Delhi and three questions may not have gone then in such specific form as they went yesterday. Panikkar saw Chang Han-Fu, General Secretary, at 7 p.m., Sunday, prior to receiving yesterday's instructions from Menon and discussed substance of three questions without getting clarification, but Han-Fu promised to put them to Chou En-Lai and get earliest reply.

1. At the meeting of the Political Committee at 3.00 p.m., Saturday, 20th January, the first speaker was Austin, who introduced the United States resolution. The text of this resolution was identical with that contained in my teletype No. 87. The United States introduced the resolution without any co-sponsors. In introducing the resolution, Austin said: "My Government believes that the time to draw the line is now. By standing together in Korea we support the United Nations Charter and preserve the principle of collective security." The representatives of Haiti, the Dominican Republic, Uruguay, Greece, Colombia, Cuba, Peru, Panama and Turkey all spoke in support of the United States resolution.

4. Much the most important statement of the day was that made by Rau of India near the end of the meeting. He said that Peking's reply was not an outright rejection of the cease fire group's principles, but amounted to "partly acceptance, partly non-acceptance, partly a request for elucidation, and partly a set of counter "proposals". He then proceeded to examine these counter-proposals in conjunction with the principles of the cease fire group and contended that there was room for negotiation and "adjustment" between the two sets of proposals. He said that clarification of Peking's reply was urgently needed and that the United Nations would not lose prestige by continuing to negotiate with a government which might be considered "a rebel against the United Nations". He pointed out that Indian leaders had rebelled against British authority in India but that this fact had not prevented Britain from negotiating with these leaders, and that today "the prestige of the United Kingdom has never stood higher in India". Rau spoke on the United States resolution only in general terms, but he made it clear that India would strongly oppose the resolution. He asked what useful purpose would be served by merely branding the Peking Government as an aggressor. So far as sanctions were concerned, he states that "the severing of diplomatic relations will isolate China even more than at present. Economic sanctions, even if feasible, will fall mainly on the people of China, who no one desires to penalize. If so, what exactly is the purpose of this stigmatization?"

5. Rau said that if such a policy of naming China an aggressor were adopted, "the present tension in the Far East would be perpetuated and would continue unabated". He concluded by saying that "my government is opposed to so disastrous a course".

Please communicate following reply of Chinese Government to Pearson for transmission to Mr. St. Laurent immediately.

We are glad to hear of the continued efforts of Mr. Nehru the Prime Minister of India for settling peacefully the Korean problem and for securing peace in the east and of the participation of Mr. St. Laurent, the Prime Minister of Canada, in the efforts for settling peacefully the Korean problem. With regard to the two points raised the reply is as follows:

(1) If the principle that all foreign troops should be withdrawn from Korea has been accepted and is being put into practice, the Central People's Government of People's Republic of China will assume the responsibility to advise the Chinese volunteers to return to China.

(2) Regarding the conclusion of the war in Korea and the peaceful settlement of the Korean problem, we think that we can proceed in two steps. First. A cease-fire for a limited time-period can be agreed upon in the first meeting of the seven-nation conference and put into effect so that the negotiations may proceed further. Second step in order that the war in Korea may be concluded completely and peace in East Asia may be ensured. All the conditions for the conclusion of the war must be discussed in connection with the political problems in order to reach agreement upon the following. The steps and measures for the withdrawal of all foreign troops from Korea; the proposals to the Korean people on the steps and measures to effect the settlement of the internal affairs of Korea by the Korean people themselves; the withdrawal of the United States armed forces from Taiwan and the Taiwan Straits in accordance with Cairo Declaration and Potsdam Declaration; and other problems concerning the Far East.

(3) The definite affirmative of the legitimate status of the People's Republic of China in the United Nations must be ensured. Text ends.

STEPS TO BE TAKEN IN THE LIGHT OF CHINESE REPLY TO QUESTIONS SENT BY MR. NEHRU

1. Political Committee should designate some body (probably Cease Fire Group) to consider whether, on the basis of Chinese replies, definite programmes for cease-fire and negotiations can now be proposed.

2. Programme for cease-fire and negotiations might be considered along following lines:

(i) Seven-power conference to be convened within one week at New York or Lake Success.

(ii) At the moment conference convenes, orders for a cease-fire (and stand-still) to be given to all commanders;

(iii) Conference agenda to be as follows:

(a) arrangements for cease-fire on basis of proposals[17] outlined in paragraph 4 of Document A/C.1/643;

(b) Arrangements for the establishment of a free and independent Korea;

(c) Arrangements for the withdrawal of all non-Korean troops from Korea which shall inc[lude] _____;

(d) Arrangements for the peaceful settlement of other Far Eastern problems. During this part of the discussion, other states might be associated with the work of the conference as found appropriate. In regard to the question of the representation of China in the United Nations, conference could agree to give whatever advice it found desirable to the United Nations Assembly.

3. Programme along the lines indicated above should then be considered by the Political Committee, and if found acceptable, referred to Peking for its acceptance.

1. At the meeting of the Political Committee at 3.00 p.m. Monday, 22nd January, the first speaker was Rau of India, who said that the Indian Ambassador in Peking had submitted to the Chinese Foreign Office a request for clarification of three points in Peking's reply to the cease-fire proposals. Rau then proceeded to read out the text of Peking's additional reply which had been transmitted through the Indian Ambassador. In my immediately following teletype† en clair I am sending you the text of Rau's statement. In the light of this further reply from Peking Rau said that many delegations would require time for "further consultations and particularly for obtaining new instructions" and, accordingly, he suggested that the committee should adjourn for forty-eight hours, after giving representatives an opportunity for preliminary comment on this further reply from Peking.

2. In the discussion which followed the representatives of the Philippines, Greece, Turkey, Chile, El Salvador and the United States opposed the adjournment, while it was supported by Jebb of the United Kingdom, Eban of Israel and Fawzi Bey of Egypt. During this debate a number of additional Latin American states, as well as the Philippines, reiterated their support for the United States resolution.

3. In supporting Rau's request for an adjournment Jebb said the communication read by Rau was "obviously of great interest and importance" and that, on the face of it, it seemed to leave the impression that Peking had come closer to accepting the cease-fire principles than had been indicated by the previous reply. Eban spoke more cautiously, but said that the document read by Rau required close study and that, for this reason, the committee might well adjourn. Fawzi intervened several times to support the proposal for adjournment and urged the committee to resist "outside pressures" which were trying to push it forward into hasty action.

4. In opposing the adjournment Romulo said that the committee could not adequately study the message read by Rau unless it was also given the text of the questions addressed by the Indian Government to Peking. Both the questions and the reply were needed by the committee if it were to take cognizance of the matter. To this Rau replied that he was not in possession of the text of India's communication to Peking and that he had already given to the committee "all the materials I have".

5. In attacking the motion for adjournment Austin made an angry and emotional statement which dismissed the communication read by Rau as being "not much more than a postal card". He also charged that this reply from Peking was a "transparent effort to divide the free world". Austin spoke contemptuously of those members of the committee who attached importance to this communication and who wanted to "hug it to their bosoms". Meanwhile, the "very large majority" of the committee who supported the United States resolution should get on with the "pending business" — i.e., adopt the United States resolution.

6. The substance and tone of Austin's outburst were so provoking that it no doubt influenced a number of delegations, who had not yet made up their minds, to support the motion for adjournment. In any case, the motion was finally approved by the committee by a vote of 27 in favour, including Canada, 23 against, and 6 abstentions. The vote was by show of hands and it was not possible to check the vote of each delegation. However, all the Commonwealth countries, except New Zealand and Australia, supported the motion for adjournment, as did France and the Soviet bloc. Australia and Belgium abstained and New Zealand voted against the adjournment. Nearly all the Latin Americans voted with the United States against the motion, while the Arab and Asian delegations naturally supported it.

7. The next meeting of the committee will accordingly be at 3.00 p.m., Wednesday, 24th January.

Rau asked me to come and see him this morning, saying that he now had views as to the next step to be taken in the Political Committee as a result of the most recent communication from Peking. He gave me a copy of a draft resolution,† text of which is given in my immediately preceding teletype. He said that he had received clearance from his government to propose this resolution, and that the eleven Asian states were prepared to be associated with him in proposing it. Asian states were meeting him at six o'clock this evening, and decision would then be taken whether or not to propose this resolution when Political Committee meets tomorrow (Wednesday).

2. Rau said that he had no idea what the United States reaction would be to this proposal, and he had rather hoped that you would be prepared to discuss it with the United States delegation. He said that he was anxious also to have the benefits of your comment and advice before he met his Asian colleagues this afternoon.

3. You will notice that effect of the draft resolution is to provide for immediate convoking of a seven-power conference, object of which will be to clarify the obscurities in the Chinese position. In other words, it would be a conference to determine whether or not negotiations for a cease-fire and for a Far Eastern settlement could take place. I remarked to Rau that, in spite of its limited terms of reference, a conference of this kind might appear to concede the principle that a cease-fire must precede a negotiating conference. We had of course always recognized that the cease-fire itself might have to be a subject of negotiation, and it had never been specified where the negotiations about the cease-fire should take place. To summon a seven-power conference before any commitment, even in principle, of the cease-fire had been taken might create difficulty.

4. I asked Rau whether he and his Asian colleagues had considered, as an alternative, the possibility of proposing a rather more precise formula providing for a seven-power conference to establish a cease-fire and then to arrange a peaceful settlement in Korea, arrange for withdrawal of troops, and proceed with the discussion of other cease-fire problems. (I spoke along the lines of the memorandum which I gave to you yesterday.) Rau said that they had considered proposals of this kind and that his Asian colleagues were prepared to amend the second Asian resolution in almost exactly the terms I had mentioned. He did not himself at the moment have instructions which would enable him to do this, but he thought he might be able to obtain the necessary clearance. If it were your view that a course of action along these lines were preferable, he and his Asian colleagues would seriously consider proceeding in that manner. He said, however, that there were certain disadvantages to this course of action that should be kept in mind. A communication to the Chinese along the lines suggested would necessitate a delay for reply. The reply would probably be equivocal, and a further delay might be necessary for further clarification. The principal advantage of the proposal contained in the draft which he gave me was that it would get around the delay and frustration caused by a sequence of communications back and forth across the Pacific. He did not, however, seem to have strong views one way or the other as to which course of action would be preferable.

5. I told Rau that I would send you immediately the text of his draft resolution and an account of our conversation.

The following is the text of a note which I received from the Minister in mid afternoon, January 23. In accordance with the Minister's instructions, I telephoned the message immediately to Mr. Riddell.

"Will you tell Mr. Riddell that the P.M. is very interested in the detailed proposals for a 7 Power Conference along the lines of our memo — though to meet the U.S.A. position we should emphasize that other countries would be included for particular questions. He would not mind my putting the idea in my speech but would hope that a Resolution would be sponsored by the Asians — or by a group, U.K., Canada, France, etc. — letting the U.S.A. know and emphasizing that this was a 48 hour take it or leave it proposition.

A general Resolution such as that suggested by Rau would not do from our point of view. Riddell should get into touch with Rau accordingly — emphasizing that the delay would not be for more than 48 hours and the resolution must be drawn in such terms that a definite acceptance or rejection must be received within that time. I would hope that Rau would accept responsibility for this but if not it should be put in tomorrow by some one if it is to be any use."

Following for Riddell from Holmes, Begins: The following is the Minister's rough draft resolution which I mentioned to you on the telephone:

"Having received the observations of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China to the statement of principles submitted to it by the Chairman of the Political Committee on January 11, and taking into account the statement of the Delegate of India reporting a clarification that his Government had received from Peking on certain points of that reply, the Political Committee recommends the following programme for a cease-fire in Korea and a peaceful settlement of Korean and Far Eastern problems:

(1) A conference of the following seven powers to be convened at Lake Success or New Delhi on (approx. Feb. 5): U.S.S.R., U.S.A., U.K., France, People's Republic of China, India and Egypt.

(2) Immediate instructions from this conference to those concerned that there should be a cease-fire and stand-still in Korea within twenty-four (?) hours.

(3) The negotiation at once of a more permanent cease-fire and arrangements on the basis of the plan submitted in the report of the cease-fire group of January 11, this arrangement to remain in effect until superseded by a peace settlement as outlined below. (It is understood that if a cease-fire arrangement is broken by either side, it is null and void).

(4) A peaceful solution of Korean problems in accordance with the principles laid down in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the statement of principles of January 11, and withdrawal from Korea of non-Korean forces, which shall include Chinese nationals and forces. (The Minister suggested that UNCURK should be given some responsibility for the solution of Korean problems although he recognized that it would be necessary for Peking representatives to be associated with it in some way for this purpose).

5. The discussion of Far Eastern problems in accordance with paragraph 4 of the above statement, and as the first item of such discussion, the request of the Central People's Government for a definite affirmation of the legitimate status of the People's Republic of China in the United Nations. For this matter the seven power conference would take the place of the Assembly Committee on representation which was instructed to report to the Assembly.

(6) In the discussion at the above conference of such subjects as the representation of China in the U.N. or the status of Formosa, any Government specially concerned shall be invited to participate.

(7) This recommendation to be transmitted at once to the Central People's Government with an indication that a reply is required within forty-eight hours of its receipt in Peking in order that the conference may be convened on the date fixed. Ends.

Reference to teletype No. 97 from Holmes, and to instructions telephoned by Holmes at four o'clock this afternoon.

1. In view of indications which we have now received from various sources of the vigorous and apparently uncompromising opposition by the United States Government to any effort to seek clarification of recent Chinese communication through Panikkar at the expense of further delay in dealing with their resolution, I have hesitated to carry out your instructions precisely. It has seemed to me that if I communicated to Rau the details of a resolution as contained in your teletype No. 97, and encouraged him in too forthright a manner to have the resolution tabled, that we would in effect be committed to supporting it. This commitment might prove embarrassing, in view of the fact that it may be difficult to get the Asian States to accept all of the points contained in our resolution.

2. In these circumstances, I told Rau that I had heard from you to the effect that you were in favour of seeking further clarification on the Chinese position by some method, that you thought a resolution along the lines that I had already indicated would be a useful way of doing so, that the effect of such a resolution would, however, be lost if it were opposed uncompromisingly by the United States, that we had no idea at the moment whether the United States would be prepared to acquiesce in a resolution along the lines we had suggested, or even in any modification of such a resolution. It seemed necessary therefore, before a decision was taken as to the method by which a further clarification should be sought from the Chinese, to determine whether the United States delegation would modify the decision which it was now taking. I added that, if any resolution along the lines indicated were put in, you felt very strongly that it should have a forty-eight hour time limit, as suggested in paragraph 7 of your telegram under reference.

1. Dean Rusk, Assistant Secretary for Far Eastern Affairs, phoned Ignatieff this morning to express State Department perplexity at the way in which the latest message from the Chinese Communist Government had been announced publicly in the Political Committee yesterday. Rusk said that it was understood in the State Department that the message, which had come in some time in the forenoon, had been the subject of discussion between certain delegations, but that the first notice the United States Government (which was most directly concerned) had of this message was the statement made by Sir Benegal Rau in the Political Committee. This procedure, Rusk said, resulted in a disagreeable reaction in Washington. He added that the purpose of his remarks was not to lay any complaint against any individuals, but merely to report a fact that the State Department took exception to the procedure which had been followed.

2. Rusk went on to say that it would be helpful to the State Department to have an indication of the status and significance to be attached to the Peiping message. It was the State Department understanding that the message had been received by Sir Benegal Rau from the Indian Ambassador in Peiping. The State Department would like to know whether it was an oral message made to Panikkar in the course of a conversation or whether it was a more formal written reply, made in reply to certain questions put in writing to Peiping.

3. Rusk did not offer any comment on the substance of the Peiping message. In a conversation with Hayden Raynor, however, Ignatieff's attention was drawn to Reston's article on the front page of the New York Times today which he said was a fairly accurate reflection of some of the initial State Department reactions. Raynor went on to say that, from the United States point of view, it would be hoped that the resolution now pending before the Political Committee would be passed, not closing the door, however, to the possibilities of reaching a peaceful settlement. On a point of detail, Raynor observed that the proposed membership for the 7-power group could not be acceptable to the United States Government. It excluded a number of Governments whose interests would be most directly concerned in any of the negotiations envisaged. He thought that a solution might be worked out both by changing the nucleus of the proposed group as well as altering the membership according to the different subjects of the agenda being discussed. Thus, France would have to participate in any discussion of Indo-China, the Nationalist Government would need to participate in the discussion of Formosa and provision might have to be made for participation of Australia and New Zealand in the discussion of some Far Eastern questions.

4. We have withheld comment on the State Department's reactions pending guidance from you on what may be said concerning our part in the messages exchanged with Peiping. Ignatieff merely undertook to draw Rusk's comment to your attention.

1. After lunch, Jack Hickerson got in touch with us by telephone to say that it had been decided that the United States delegation would be instructed to press for the adoption of the condemnatory resolution pending before the Political Committee.

2. The latest message from Peiping had been analyzed in the State Department and the only new content, in their opinion, was the idea that the cease-fire should be the first item on the agenda of a 7-power conference which would be called to discuss a broad agenda of Far Eastern questions. The United States view of a cease-fire, he said, still remained unchanged; it should be accepted outright by all concerned and the details worked out between the military commands in the field. The negotiations now suggested seemed to provide for a temporary cease-fire with the Chinese Communist forces apparently reserving the right to resume hostilities any time the negotiations on the other matters proved unsatisfactory to them. Hickerson said the United States insisted that negotiations should not be under duress.

3. Hickerson also said that he would not be frank if he did not say that the State Department had been surprised that there had been no consultation with the United States before an approach had been made to Peiping for clarification of their position on the cease-fire. He said that it was quite realized that the governments were at liberty to make approaches of this kind, but, in the view that any negotiations with Peiping should be under United Nations auspices and under conditions approved by the General Assembly and not under the auspices of a select group of governments. Hickerson said the United States would oppose any further approaches under United Nations auspices to the Peiping Government with regard to a cease-fire.

Your telegrams No. WA-280 and 293 of January 23.

1. You may explain to Rusk and Hickerson the following circumstances in connection with the latest message from Peking.

2. Our inquiry was in no sense a negotiation with the Peking Government. We were puzzled by the obscurities in the first Chinese reply, and as we had no channel through which to seek clarification directly, the Prime Minister quite naturally asked Mr. Nehru if Panikkar might be able to find out the real intentions of the Chinese. We assumed, as no doubt everyone else assumed, that Panikkar and other representatives in Peking would be trying to find out what the Chinese meant by their reply. We were very much surprised ourselves when the reply came back in what seemed to be a direct reply to Mr. St. Laurent from Chou En-Lai. The reply was a formal written communication.

3. The reply was transmitted to Rau in New York who sent me a copy. This reached us late Monday morning, not long before we left for Lake Success. There was, therefore, no time to discuss the matter with our friends, particularly as we had first to consider the attitude which we would adopt. I did not consider, furthermore, that I had the right to pass on a message which, in the form in which it reached us, appeared to be addressed in the first place to Rau. There was no time even to consider fully with Rau how this would be presented, and we did not know until we reached Lake Success that Rau intended to make public the message. It was my intention, of course, to discuss the matter with the Americans. The reason I did not speak to them before the meeting was that there was not time after our arrival, and, furthermore, I learned that Jebb had shown the text of the telegram to Gross. It is not quite true to say that the U.S. Government learned of the message first from Rau's statement. They were given as much advance warning as anyone else, with the exception of the U.K. who happened to be the technical agents for transmitting the message to Rau.

4. You should remind Rusk that at a meeting last Friday in New York to discuss possible amendment of the U.S. resolution, I told Gross and the others present that the Prime Minister was in communication with Nehru about the meaning of the Chinese reply. That was all there was to be said on the subject until just before Monday's meeting.

5. I see no reason at all why we were under any obligation to give the Americans full details of an informal exchange of messages with another Commonwealth government. As for consulting the Americans about the enquiry, they had made themselves so clear on the subject of the Chinese reply, even to the extent of producing a precipitate rejection, that there was really no point in asking for any clarification of their views. We had certain doubts about the meaning of the Chinese reply, and they obviously had none.

6. You might also point out to the State Department that Monday was a very difficult morning for us. Before receiving the unexpected reply from Peking, we had had the unpleasant shock of Gross's apparent revision of U.S. policy reported in the morning papers, about which we had had no advance notice. With this to consider, as well as the message from Peking, I could not mention the matter to anyone until I had had an opportunity to discuss our situation thoroughly with Ottawa.

7. We consider that we have no reason at all to be apologetic about our actions. You should be careful to avoid, furthermore, any suggestion that we are passing any blame on to the Indians.

INTERNATIONAL SITUATION; RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

42. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that recent developments in the United Nations with respect to the Korean problem seemed to indicate that the United States had never been truly convinced of the wisdom of the United Nations accepting the Statement of Principles which had been submitted to Communist China some time ago. Although the first reply from Peiping had seemed at first glance to be unsatisfactory to the point of being unacceptable, subsequent clarifications obtained through the Indian Ambassador to Communist China had indicated that the door was not closed to further negotiations. U.S. representatives, however, were not inclined to accept these clarifications as the basis for further negotiations or the actual calling of a peace conference but were still pressing for adoption of a resolution condemning Communist China as an aggressor and calling upon the Collective Measures Committee to recommend what further steps should be taken. The U.S. resolution, as introduced in the First Political Committee, had been modified to meet, partially at least, the views of the United Kingdom, Canada and other member nations. The U.S. position in this matter had been supported only by the Latin-American countries, Turkey, Greece and the Philippines.

If and when the U.S. resolution came to a vote, it was recommended that the Canadian representative should voice Canada's interpretation of the true meaning of the resolution which was to the effect that Communist China had, in fact, assisted belatedly in an aggression which had been committed originally in June of last year by the North Koreans and that adoption of the resolution would in no manner grant automatic authorization to the Unified Command to carry out active operational engagements against Chinese territory. With these reservations, it was suggested that Canada should vote for the resolution as a whole.

43. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that whether or not the reply submitted by Communist China was sincere this whole episode had had, as a practical result, the effect of causing a regrettable divergence of views between the United States and Canada. Every care should be taken to avoid any widening of this rift and indeed everything should be done to facilitate complete unity of views between western democracies.

44. The Prime Minister said that when the U.S. resolution was put to a vote, Canada should vote for it with an explanation as outlined by Mr. Pearson since the fact could not be avoided that Communist China had aided the aggressor in Korea.

45. Mr. Pearson said it was possible that Asian members might sponsor a resolution calling for the establishment of a four-power conference to review far eastern questions generally. Such a conference would include Russia, the United Kingdom, the United States and Communist China. It seemed inadvisable for Canada to support such a resolution, if presented, since the participation of Communist China in a conference of this character while hostilities continued in Korea seemed clearly unacceptable.

46. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the report by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on recent developments at the United Nations respecting the Korean problem.

1. At the meeting of the Political Committee at 3.00 p.m. yesterday, 24th January, Austin pressed for adoption of the United States resolution as being essential to preserve collective security. He stated that "if any one of us is attacked, each of us would in that situation desperately ask the United Nations to provide the unified support of every other government in the world to meet the attack. How can we bring that about for our own countries? Only by a determination to take united action to support each other faithfully and vigorously when an act of aggression occurs." Austin also analyzed the additional reply by Peking read by Rau at the meeting of 22nd January (my teletype No. 105)† and dismissed this as being "another rejection" of the cease fire principles.

4. During the meeting the twelve Asian-Arab states circulated a revision of their previous draft resolution, but none of them have yet had the opportunity to formally introduce it. The text of this new Asian resolution is contained in my teletype No. 118.† It is expected that Rau will formally introduce it at the next meeting of the committee today, 3.00 p.m., 25th January.

1. The Political Committee held a meeting this morning (26 January) and adjourned until tomorrow morning without holding an afternoon meeting. The reason for the adjournment was a Latin-American suggestion that, as today is "Republic of India Day", it would be a courtesy to India not to meet in the afternoon. This was adopted without discussion, and the meeting rose at 2 p.m.

2. The first speaker at today's meeting was Mr. Pearson. A fairly full summary of his statement is contained in press release GA/PS/422 on the United Nations teleprinter. I shall send you by bag copies of the verbatim transcript of Mr. Pearson's statement as delivered.[18]

3. Apart from Mr. Pearson's statement, by far the most important other statement today was that of Eban of Israel, who spoke in a very similar manner. I am commenting separately on Eban's statement and on other behind-the-scenes developments today.

4. There are still a number of representatives on the Speaker's list, and it is by no means certain that a vote will take place tomorrow, although this seems quite possible if two meetings are held. It also seems probable that, prior to voting on either the United States or Asian resolutions, a procedural battle will develop as to which of these resolutions has priority in the vote. The Asian group have introduced their present resolution in the form of a revision of their resolution of 12 December, and will argue that for this reason it has priority over the United States resolution.

1. After my statement this morning, first Jamali of Iraq and later Sir Benegal Rau told me that the Asian group would be considering this afternoon an amendment of their resolution to incorporate points which I had made. They both asked me how I felt about this. I said that we ourselves were not proposing any new resolution or any amendments to existing resolutions, but that naturally any suggestions made by our delegation could be utilized by any other delegation, if it saw fit. I pointed out to them both that in making the suggestions regarding a programme of cease-fire and negotiation, I had had in mind that this programme might be taken up by the Good Offices Committee immediately it was established. I agreed, however, that if these points were incorporated in the Asian resolution, it would probably command more support than it will at present. One objection to this course was that if the Asian resolution was voted on first, and defeated, with the amendments now suggested, it might be a little more difficult for the Good Offices Committee later to put forward those suggestions to the Peking Government. This, however, was not a difficulty of any great substance, I thought. Sir Benegal asked me point-blank whether we would support the Asian resolution if it were amended along the lines of our suggestions. I said that that would depend entirely on the form of the resolution as the Asians finally agreed on it. It would be difficult for us, certainly, to oppose it, and it might even be drafted in a way which would command our support if, in fact, it were voted on first. This question of priority of voting between the two resolutions, is, indeed, becoming of increasing importance, and we are not certain here what course we should follow in regard to it.

2. After the morning meeting, Gross of the United States delegation told me that the British had proposed to them certain amendments to their resolution which would have the effect of suspending action by the Collective Measures Committee until the Good Offices Committee had reported to the Assembly. They forwarded this suggestion to Washington where it was considered this morning at a Cabinet meeting and was rejected both by the President and the Secretary of State. Washington, however, has agreed to an alteration of their resolution by which the cease-fire group in its work would take into consideration the report of the Good Offices Committee. Gross did not think they would go any further than this.

3. Afterwards I had lunch with Jebb who explained to me the latest attitude of his Government toward the United States resolution, and their feeling now that if it could be amended along the lines of the Israeli proposal,[19] and if it could be made clear that there would be no consideration of Collective Measures until the Good Offices Committee had reported, they would approve it. On the other hand, if these amendments could not be accepted, they would vote against the United States resolution, and they felt that several other delegations would support them in this course. I suggested to Jebb that the American reluctance to accept their amendment might be lessened if they attached a time limit to the work of the Good Offices Committee, say three or four weeks, and he said he would pass on this idea to London. I also pointed out to him that the amendment which the Americans had agreed to accept did, in fact, seem to accomplish what they wish, because it would mean that the Collective Measures Committee could be suspended until there was something to report to it from the Good Offices group. He was interested in this, and said that he hoped that his Government might, in the light of this interpretation, be satisfied with the United States amendment, if Washington would not accept anything else.

4. So far as we are concerned, I think that we should support the United Kingdom and Israeli amendments to the United States resolution if they are submitted or, alternatively, the United States amendment if that is all we can get. I should add that the Americans have also agreed to accept a small change to paragraph 2 which would alter the words "has rejected" to "has not approved", or something like that. This would make it possible for us to support that paragraph on which, in its present form, we would abstain.

5. I think that if the United States resolution can now be put in an amended form incorporating United Kingdom and Israeli ideas, it will get a very large majority. Otherwise, I think that though it will command 2/3 majority, there may well be 20 or 23 votes against and abstentions.

6. My own feeling is that things are moving at the moment in a better direction, and that there is still some possibility of a resolution which, by combining a condemnation with stronger provisions for cease-fire and negotiation, will command a very great measure of support indeed. This would, of course, be the most desirable result and we will do our best to bring it about. We should know pretty well where we stand on these matters tomorrow afternoon.

Minister has given permission to use following summary of Canadian statement in First Committee today which was requested earlier by Tremblay over telephone for transmission to posts abroad, Begins: Statement began with analysis of first efforts of cease-fire group, statement of principles January 11th, Peking note January 17th and subsequent clarification through India. Direct summary of remainder follows. Canadian delegation believes Political Committee would have been wise consider six point programme as test China's real intentions.

(1) Immediate conference United States, United Kingdom, France, USSR, India, Egypt, People's Republic; (2) First business appointment Cease-Fire Committee United States, People's Republic and members UNCURK to arrange immediate cease-fire before other items; (3) Conference to consider peaceful solution Korean problems and withdrawal foreign troops as in statement principles; (4) Discussion Far East problems as in paragraph 5 statement principles. (Conference could only express view on representation); (5) Governments with special interest would participate as appropriate; (6) United Nations to transmit programme to Peking and request answer 48 hours after receipt.

To ascertain such procedure worthwhile Canadian Prime Minister had asked India address clarification questions Peking. Canada would have liked see consideration given some such programme as outlined.

Asian resolution — is not best method reaching objective. Might lead discussion general questions without cease-fire, thus sacrificing basic principle cease-fire first.

United States resolution — decision on it difficult if one accepts sense responsibility under Charter and understanding where resolution may lead. Duty not discharged by joining in moral condemnation. Infinite patience has been needed maintain peace through United Nations. Even in present difficult situation Canada believes in continuing efforts find peaceful honourable solution of conflict and differences with China. We should be ready hold door open for further negotiations if reason believe successful. Could wish last paragraph United States resolution broader but if China has not closed door discussions could continue regardless this resolution. Statement of principles still stands.

Canada supports resolution since cannot deny fact Chinese forces participating in aggression. China must understand settlement impossible until participation ended. Resolution not declaration war nor intention destroy Peking regime but call Peking desist aggression engage peaceful settlement. Should recognize possibility China imprisoned by own dogma and thinks acting self-defence. Should give further assurance our intentions.

Collective Measures Committee should recognize free world forces are limited and free world as whole under menace greater than Chinese. Should be aware Soviet complicity Korea. Must not be distracted into war with country when no basic grounds quarrel. Committee should have major objective peaceful settlement issues which can be settled while strengthening United Nations effort Korea. Should show wisdom restraint.

Canada's view resolution doesn't give Unified Command Pacific any authority not already possessed.

Some features resolution don't carry considered judgment Canadian delegation although will vote for resolution as whole, reserving position on amendments and paragraph two. Delegation thinks presentation such resolution when possibility negotiation with China not exhausted is premature and unwise. Supporting because main purport is condemn Chinese assistance aggressor. United Nations cannot ignore such defiance. Canada has honest differences with United States will continue press policies conducive peaceful settlement Far East. Text ends.

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

My telegram No. 30 of January 27th.
Repeat Most Immediate to the Minister in New York.

The Prime Minister asked me to transmit to our Prime Minister following message received from Panikkar. Message begins:

For the Prime Minister. I saw Chou En-Lai today at 3:30 p.m. and had an hour's discussion with him about your message. I explained to him at some length the necessity of consolidating world opinion by an affirmation of China's desire for peace and her adherence to the principle of settlement through negotiation. This was already known to friendly countries but needed to be emphasized in order to reach as wide a circle as possible and that "a conciliatory statement made in a proper way would rouse popular enthusiasm and produce favourable results in neutral and friendly countries". Chou, after expressing appreciation of your sentiments and determination for a peaceful settlement, said "as to Premier Nehru's suggestion that we make a statement to mobilize world opinion, we believe it is correct. At the proper time we shall do so. But we must not, repeat not, allow such a statement to be taken as a sign of weakness by opponents to peaceful settlement". He elaborated this point by citing United States pressure on Canada and others. Canada had originally supported Commonwealth proposals and in that belief they replied to queries of St. Laurent. The present change in Canadian attitude, he charges, was due to an attempt by the United States to put pressure on China to make further concessions especially with regard to prior implementation of cease-fire. He added "when we heard of peaceable efforts by Canada we were glad and willing to cooperate but now they have changed their position under American pressure and are trying to trap us and appease America".

2. Chou did not, repeat not, therefore, consider the present a suitable moment for a conciliatory statement. He drew attention to Chairman Mao's statement to me yesterday "what India has been working for and what the 12-nation proposal means is a genuine peace and we are willing to co-operate. But those who support America's demands to condemn us and at the same time talk of negotiation are not, repeat not, working genuinely for peace".

3. I tried to explain that, while no, repeat no, doubt America has been putting pressure on her associates, we should not, repeat not, forget that her associates were equally putting pressure on her. I drew attention to the British Ambassador's representation to the State Department regarding the (group corrupt as received) Truman's declaration about Formosa which, as a result, has been repudiated. I said that there was much more pressure put on America behind the scenes than public statements would lead one to suppose and he should not, repeat not, be misled by appearances.

4. They could put this pressure on only by accepting some part of United Nations position.

5. Chou replied that, if any attempt is made to combine condemnation of China with proposal for conference, China could not, repeat not, accept it. The position, he said, is simple. Question is a seven nation conference for which a basis exists and we should not, repeat not, complicate it.

6. I said that this was position taken by India and that further examination and discussion should be at conference. After redevising offer of conference with a temporary cease-fire in order to facilitate negotiation, Chou said "what America wants is a cease-fire without settling the basis for negotiation so that discussion may be prolonged endlessly. It is because of our own desire for peace and our regard for this country in (group corrupt) nations who genuinely desire peace that we agreed to have cease-fire at first meeting of conference. This was a genuine peace effort on the part of China". I went back to the original question of a statement by him and he replied again that at the proper time he would make it but "we do not, repeat not, desire to give the United States the wrong impression that we are weakening because it is putting pressure on other countries".

7. He desired me to convey these sentiments to you and through you to all peace loving countries.

8. Following are my impressions:

Firstly, China will consider a resolution condemning her as a hostile act and possibility of peaceful settlement will thereby be finally extinguished. This, I suggest, should be made unmistakably clear to the Commonwealth and other friendly countries.

Secondly, China is willing for an immediate conference on basis of 12-nation resolution and would not, repeat not, enter into further elucidation and explanation except at conference.

Thirdly, it is significant that in contrast to Soviet delegation objection, Chou did not, repeat not, raise any points regarding the suggestion that time and place of meeting should be settled by the President, but they have already made it clear that they will not, repeat not, go to America.

I am convinced that this is the last opportunity for peaceable negotiation and the Chinese believe that they have gone to maximum length to meet suggestions from friendly countries, particularly India. American pressure on countries which were inclined to be friendly and weakness shown by Canada and, in some measure, by Britain have stiffened Chinese attitude, as they feel that America desires to humiliate them first before any negotiations take place. Message ends.

SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Washington No. 93.

Following from the Minister, Begins: After talking to the Prime Minister last night on the telephone, I changed my plans and decided to remain here until tomorrow afternoon in the hope that the vote would be taken then on the Korean resolution. Mr. St. Laurent felt that in view of the more understanding attitude of the United States in the last few days, shown in Austin's statement before the Political Committee yesterday, and in the amendments which they are now willing to accept to their draft resolution, we could give that resolution stronger support than previously. He also hoped that the United Kingdom and France could now vote for it, and indicated that if I could do anything to this end in New York, it would be a good move. Consequently, this morning I tried to get Sir Gladwyn Jebb to discuss with him recent United States moves and our hope that United Kingdom reaction to them was favourable. I was unable to do this as Jebb was out of town, but Mr. Riddell passed on our views to Coulson, and I telephoned them to Mr. Wrong for transmission to Oliver Franks.

2. The frank and forthright acceptance by Austin, on behalf of the United States Government, of our understanding that the United States resolution does not give the Unified Command or its commanders in Korea any authority to take action which it and they do not already possess is heartening. Also, the proposed amendment to paragraph 8 means that the Collective Measures Committee would not have to make any report as long as the work of the good offices group was proceeding satisfactorily. This amendment, which should remove many of the United Kingdom doubts about this provision, would add to the present paragraph 8, the following words:

"... it being understood that the committee is authorized to defer its report if the Good Offices Committee referred to in the following paragraph reports satisfactory progress."

3. Yesterday at lunch, and later at dinner, Rau discussed with me ways and means to facilitate the work of the Good Offices Committee, which might also make it possible for him to serve on that committee as the President of the Assembly desires. We thought that once the United States resolution carried in the Political Committee, there might be a proposal to the effect that no action should be taken in regard to its confirmation in plenary assembly until the Good Offices Committee had an opportunity to pursue its work for a short time; the President to decide when to call the Assembly together. This would mean that formal and final action would not be taken at once against the Chinese. This would make some appeal, presumably, to Peking, while the strong condemnatory action which will presumably be taken by the Political Committee might satisfy public opinion in the United States, which would not then oppose a short delay in respect of confirmation by the Assembly while the Good Offices Committee was working. I think that this suggestion might have useful results. We have passed it on to the British but have not yet mentioned it to the United States delegation.

4. Entezam told me yesterday that he was going to ask Rau and me to form the Good Offices Committee. I told him that this might be difficult for me as I could not continue to be in New York. He said, however, that in his view the Good Offices Committee need not do the actual work of negotiation itself, but should establish some machinery to this end, and merely supervise that machinery by occasional meetings. For that purpose, he would be quite happy if Mr. Riddell could take my place at such meetings in New York when I was not present. We also discussed the appointment to the Good Offices Committee of someone as a Secretary or Agent General, who would have to do most of the day-to-day work. I expressed the view that for this purpose Ralph Bunche was the obvious choice, and the others concurred. Entezam said that he did not feel that he could take on this job unless he had the same group with him that had worked on cease-fire activities, as he felt that if we could not accept appointment, it might be interpreted as a reflection on him and on our previous work. He, therefore, strongly urged Rau and me to join him, emphasizing again that it would not involve for me any great activity or frequent visits to New York. We both agreed to refer the matter to our governments. I would be glad, therefore, if this matter could be brought at once to the attention of the Prime Minister. I will also discuss it with the United States delegation here as it would be out of the question for any Canadian, I think, to be appointed to this group if he did not command the confidence of the authorities in Washington. Ends.

KOREAN RESOLUTION

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: I informed Riddell last night about my discussion with Franks yesterday afternoon which indicated the very strong probability that the United Kingdom would vote for the amended United States resolution. Ignatieff saw Steel this morning to find out the results of a meeting late yesterday with Rusk and Hickerson in which the British, under instructions from London, sought assurances that the United States would not object to a program on the general lines of your speech of January 26th.

2. Steel said that the State Department had agreed that the Good Offices Committee should consider your suggestions. They also agreed that the Peking Government should participate in any negotiations for a cease-fire under the auspices of that committee and said they were ready to deal with the Peking Government in further negotiations for a peaceful settlement in Korea and other outstanding Far Eastern issues. They retain their objection, however, to the composition of the seven-power group mentioned by you and others as a negotiating body.

3. Steel said the Cabinet was meeting in London this morning to decide on the instructions to Jebb, but he had no doubt that in view of these assurances Jebb would be authorized to vote for the United States resolution. Ends.

KOREA

1. At 10.10 p.m. last night, 30 January, the Political Committee adopted the United States resolution, as amended by Lebanon. The vote on the resolution as a whole was 44 in favour, 7 against (the Soviet bloc, Burma and India), 8 abstentions (Afghanistan, Egypt, Indonesia, Pakistan, Sweden, Syria, Yemen and Yugoslavia), and one state (Saudi Arabia) "not participating in the vote". My immediately following teletype† en clair contains the text of the amended resolution as adopted.[20]

2. Prior to the vote on the main resolution five separate votes were taken on portions of the resolution. The first seven paragraphs were adopted by a vote of 44 in favour, 7 against (the Soviet bloc, Burma and India) and 7 abstentions. The Lebanese amendment to paragraph 8 — i.e., to add the words "it being understood that the committee is authorized to defer its report if the Good Offices Committee, referred to in the following paragraph, reports satisfactory progress in its efforts", was then adopted by a vote of 42 in favour, 7 against (including China) and 9 abstentions. Paragraph 8, as amended, was then adopted by 42 in favour, 7 against, and 10 abstentions. The first part of paragraph 9, down to the words "by peaceful means" was then adopted by 46 in favour, 5 against and 7 abstentions; and the remainder of paragraph 9 was adopted by a vote of 43 in favour, 5 against, and 11 abstentions. On these two latter votes the only negative votes were cast by the Soviet bloc. Canada voted affirmatively on each of these votes.

3. Before the vote on the United States resolution the twelve-power Asian resolution was rejected by a series of individual votes on portions of the resolution, and consequently, under Rule 128, no vote was taken on the resolution as a whole. These individual votes were not by roll call so it was not possible to see how each state was voting. Nevertheless, it was noticed that Yugoslavia voted for all parts of the Asian resolution. The only other affirmative votes were cast by the Soviet bloc for all of the resolution except the second sentence in the operative paragraph beginning "as the first step towards this end". The Soviet representative had moved an amendment to this phrase which repeated practically verbatim Peking's second reply regarding a limited cease-fire, which was transmitted through Panikkar and read by Rau in the committee on 22 January (see paragraph 2 of my teletype No. 105)†. In the vote on this Soviet amendment the Asian states did not "participate in the vote" as they claimed they did not have instructions. The Soviet amendment was defeated by 5 in favour, 38 against and 6 abstentions. After the defeat of this amendment the Soviet bloc voted against the phrase in the Asian resolution beginning "as the first step towards this end", but supported the remainder of the resolution.

4. The three meetings held on Tuesday prior to the voting on the Asian and United States resolutions were marked by an apparent filibuster on the part of the Soviet bloc to delay the voting. Strenuous efforts were also made by India and Egypt to postpone the vote until today in view of the Soviet amendment to the Asian resolution referred to above. Eventually a Turkish proposal calling for closure of debate and an immediate vote on the two resolutions was adopted by 36 in favour, 17 against (the Soviet bloc and the Asian states) and 5 abstentions. The voting then took place with the results given above.

5. In the course of the discussion preceding the voting Mr. Pearson explained our vote on both the United States and Asian resolutions. The text of his statement is contained in my teletype No. 149.[21]

6. During the discussion at yesterday's meeting Sir Benegal Rau stated that his government had been informed "from the highest sources in Peking" that on 26 January the Peking Government regarded the Asian resolution "as providing a genuine basis for a peaceful settlement". Just before the voting on the United States resolution Rau intervened again to place it on record that "when the world was marching, in our view, toward disaster we — most of the Asian powers — did all we could to halt that march". He argued vehemently that, if the United States resolution were adopted, tension in the Far East would be perpetuated and "the atmosphere for successful negotiations would be vitiated".

7. Before the plenary session of the Assembly can act on this resolution it will be necessary, under Article 12 of the Charter, for the Security Council to drop this item from its agenda. The council is meeting today, 31 January, at 10.45 a.m. for this purpose, and it is possible that several meetings of the council will be required to deal with the matter in view of the probable filibustering tactics of the Soviet Union.

Your telegram No. 31 of January 28.

1. In view of the fact that Canada is specifically mentioned in Panikkar's message of January 27 to Mr. Nehru and in order to ensure that the Canadian Government's position is completely understood by the Indian Government, I should be grateful if you would give Bajpai a copy of the text of the statement which I made at the United Nations on Jan[uary] 30 in explanation of the Canadian vote and if you would also bring the following observations to Bajpai's attention. The text of my statement is given in my immediately following telegram.†

2. Chou En-Lai's interpretation of the Canadian position as set forth in his discussion with Panikkar was obviously based on a very incomplete summary of my speech of January 26, since he shows a complete misunderstanding of the position of the Canadian Government and misrepresents it very gravely. Chou En-Lai suggests that we have altered our position because of United States pressure and that acting under such pressure we are trying to trap the Chinese and appease America. This, of course, is not true.

3. It has been clear to us since the beginning of December that if a resolution, in appropriate terms and factually correct, condemning China for assisting in the Korean aggression were introduced in the Assembly and were put to the vote, we would have no alternative but to vote for it, even though we considered it, as stated on January 26th, to be untimely and unwise. It seemed to us that not to vote for such a resolution would be to refuse to face the obvious facts. We have, however, since the Chinese assistance in Korean aggression became flagrant at the beginning of December, consistently and forcefully urged that the United Nations should continue as long as possible to refrain from naming the Chinese People's Government an aggressor. The counsels of caution which we and other like-minded governments gave to the United States resulted in the United States refraining for some time from pressing a resolution on aggression to a vote, but during last week it became clear that the great majority of the members of the United Nations would find it impossible to continue any longer to refrain from condemning the Chinese People's Government for the aid and assistance which they have given to those who were already committing aggression in Korea.

4. When this became clear we tried to persuade the United States to modify its resolution and agree to a conciliatory interpretation of it and we had a considerable measure of success. In this sense we were putting far more pressure on the United States than the United States had been putting on us.

5. Furthermore, if it had been possible for the Asian countries to modify their resolution so that it not only made clear that fighting must stop before subsequent political negotiations begin, but also included substantially our proposals of January 26th, we could have voted for it. My explanation of vote given on January 30th does not spell out all of our objections to the revised Asian Resolution, but it gives you generally the reasons why we could not accept it; our main objection was that it did not lay down any specific programme with dates, etc., which would have prevented the Government in Peking returning an ambiguous and delaying reply. This seemed to us to be essential.

6. Although we are naturally disappointed to see how seriously Premier Chou has misunderstood both our peaceful motives and the manner in which we have pursued them, just as we have done our best to urge the United States authorities not to close the door completely as long as there is hope of peaceful negotiations, we would also view with the deepest regret any act on the part of the Chinese People's Government which would close the door from their side. We do not see why formal condemnation of Chinese participation in aggression should be regarded as a final end to all hopes of a peaceful settlement. In fact, together with other delegations, notably the Indian and United Kingdom, we have insisted that efforts should be continued through some Good Offices Committee to explore all possible opportunities for peaceful negotiation on honourable terms. While on the one hand the Canadian Government is determined to uphold the principles of the Charter, on the other its purpose is not to humiliate the Chinese Government. If, in the light of these considerations, the Chinese People's Government nevertheless takes such steps as to close all avenues of negotiation, we cannot but feel that the full responsibility for subsequent development must in all honesty lie with the Chinese People's Government.

7. I can understand the attitude of the Indian Government with regard to Rau serving on the Good Offices Committee, but I nevertheless regret the decision taken. The fact that India voted against the United States Resolution would have made Rau an even more useful member of the committee than if they had abstained or voted for it. I, with the Prime Minister's approval, would have been willing to serve again with him, but as he has not been able to accept the President's invitation, I have informed Entezam that I also will not be available. TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Please pass the following to Mr. Nehru from the Prime Minister, Begins: The recent vote in the Political Committee on the United States resolution has brought us to the end of one chapter, at least, in the record of United Nations efforts to deal with Far Eastern problems. Though I greatly regret that on this occasion, our two governments found themselves in opposing positions on the vote, I am less disappointed by this circumstance than I am encouraged by the results of our joint efforts in the interests of a peaceful settlement of Far Eastern problems.

2. We have been able through our efforts to bring about a modification in the position of both the United States Government and the Central Peoples Government to an extent, which, at the time of General Wu's appearance in New York, I would have thought impossible. On the one hand, we seem to have induced the Chinese Government to accept the principle that a cease-fire must precede other negotiations and that their troops must be withdrawn along with other non-Korean troops from the Korean peninsula. On the other hand, the United States Government, by concurring in the statement of principles contained in the report of the cease-fire group of January 11th, has indicated its willingness to enter into discussions with the Chinese Communists on basic Far Eastern problems.

3. There have of course been limitations for both our governments on the extent to which we could carry out joint efforts. For you, these limitations arose out of policies in regard to the United Nations and in regard to your relationship with other Asian states which you have frequently made known. For us, they arose equally out of our attitude towards the collective security system and our relationships with our great neighbours. It has always been clear to us that once we were faced with the question of whether or not the Chinese had participated in aggression in Korea we could not do otherwise than answer yes. We have also felt that we could not expect the United States Government to sit at the conference table with Chinese Communists unless the Chinese were unequivocally committed to a programme beginning with the cease-fire and proceeding with other subjects in an orderly and pre-determined manner. Therefore, we were faced with the logical necessity of abstaining on the Asian Resolution calling for a seven power conference. It seemed to us that further clarification from the Chinese should now be sought by other means. But, despite Mr. Pearson's efforts, it was not possible to persuade the Committee to accept any such course before it dealt with the United States Resolution. Therefore, our Delegation had to take up a position on that resolution. We brought to bear our full influence on the United States Government to make their resolution in as moderate terms as would still be acceptable to the United States public. However harmful you may feel the United States Resolution in its final form to have been, I am sure you would consider that our influence, together with that of other delegations, had improved it very substantially.

4. Our joint efforts have, of course, been subject to a great deal of misinterpretation in both the United States and China. It is, I suppose, inevitable that such efforts as ours should be misunderstood, and I am not therefore surprised that Chou En-Lai, as reported by Mr. Panikkar, should have said that Canada had altered its position because of United States pressure, and that under this pressure we were trying to trap the Chinese and appease America. I am sure that your representative in Peking will do whatever is possible to correct that misinterpretation of our position.

5. The great question before us now is, of course, whether or not adoption of the United States resolution will put an end to all possibility of a peaceful settlement of Far Eastern questions within the foreseeable future. The Chinese have, as your representative has reported, said that this would be the case, and it may well be that their prophecy will turn out to be correct on this as on previous occasions. It should be pointed out, of course, that the Chinese People's Government on their part do not hesitate to condemn in violent terms the United States, acting as an agent of the United Nations, for aggression in Korea, and nevertheless expect that country and the rest of us to enter into negotiations around the council table. I hope Chou En-Lai can be made aware of this inconsistency. We have not hesitated on our part to press for negotiations with the Peking regime in spite of the language used by them in their reference to United Nations action in Korea. If they now take the position that a United Nations resolution condemning them puts an end finally to all hope of settlement, it will seem to confirm the view of many that there was from the beginning no hope of success in such negotiations and that the Chinese regime has been insincere in discussing their possibility.

6. In the long run, however, it seems to me that the attitude adopted on both sides will be determined by the realities of the material situation in the Far East generally and in Korea in particular. Though it may be extremely difficult to make any progress in the near future, I nevertheless hope that before long a further chance of negotiated settlement may emerge. With this in mind, I think we should hold firm to the view that the statement of principles which we enunciated and which was accepted by the Political Committee provides an adequate basis for a peaceful settlement. Ends.

1. I had an interesting talk late yesterday with Rusk on the program which might be followed in dealing with the Korean situation. He began by saying that the State Department would welcome three-cornered discussions with the British and ourselves designed to work out a course of action on the lines that you proposed in your speech of January 26th.[22] They think that any program of this nature should not be put in the form of a resolution, as it ought to be left flexible to meet changing conditions. The only criticism made of your suggestions was that they would not be willing to bind themselves to sit down in a Far Eastern conference composed as you suggested, although they would be willing to meet with the Chinese Communists and the Russians provided that adequate diplomatic preparation by the participating friendly countries had taken place. Rusk went on to describe the general stages he thought should be followed, saying that this was not yet official policy, but was likely to become so.

2. The first stage should be a cease-fire with the 38th Parallel as the boundary line. The basis should be that laid down in the December report of the Cease-Fire Committee after discussions with the Unified Command, except that they might be prepared to forgo the creation of a demilitarized zone if this appeared to be feasible from a military point of view.[23] He thought such a cease-fire could best be discussed through confidential channels. ated in advance so as to ensure against a Chinese build-up; agreed methods of supervision of the execution of the cease-fire were therefore necessary.

3. The next stage would be to work out a longer range settlement in Korea itself. He said that the prospect of being able to establish a unified Korea had now become distant and that he was thinking in terms of the possible re-establishment of the situation prevailing up to June 25th. This would be tolerable, provided that it was accompanied by international commitments which would safeguard the Korean Republic from attack in conjunction with their own enlarged and re-equipped military forces. He remarked that such an outcome would simplify Korean reconstruction by confining United Nations responsibility to the R.O.K.; North Korean towns were now "sticks and stones".

4. If this stage could be successfully completed, they would then be prepared to enter into discussions on Far Eastern questions. They would wish to match the two major Chinese objectives of Formosa and seating in the United Nations with the introduction of issues affecting Indo-China, Communist penetration elsewhere in free Asia, the treatment of foreign interests and foreigners in China, and possibly Tibet. The composition of the discussion should vary according to the subject. He insisted, however, that where they were "competing claimants" (i.e., the Chinese Communists and Nationalists) they would want both of them to be represented in the talks. He thinks that any discussions of this nature would have to be strung out over a lengthy period and that the diplomatic preparation by the friendly countries should be as careful and complete as that preceding the proposed meeting of the Council of Foreign Ministers on European issues.

5. We then turned to discussing action under the resolution passed by the Political Committee on January 30th. He said that they were in no hurry to put proposals before the Collective Measures Committee, which ought to take its time before making any proposals for sanctions. He did not disagree when I said that the threat of possible sanctions might well be a greater deterrent or bargaining lever than any sanctions which could in fact be agreed upon. He also remarked on the complexity of the issues involved in working out selective economic sanctions. No instructions on this subject have yet been sent to the United States delegation.

6. As to the new Good Offices Committee, I told him that I understood that Rau would not be permitted to serve by Nehru and that you also would in these circumstances be unwilling to serve. He said that as alternatives they were thinking of a Norwegian or a Swede, together with Malik of Lebanon if he were ready to act. (He said there had been a bitter dispute in Stockholm preceding Swedish abstention on Tuesday). I mentioned your view that an effective negotiator should be designated by the Secretary General to act for the committee, possibly Bunche. He remarked that he doubted whether the Chinese would deal with an American citizen and whether Bunche would himself agree to serve on this account. He agreed, however, that the committee should have such an agent, and suggested the possibility that a suitable (continental European or British) person might be selected from outside the United Nations Secretariat. He also thought that in filling Rau's and your places member should be chosen from a country effectively represented in Peking.

7. Rusk, as usual, was cool and constructive. On the military side he remarked that it was evident that the United Nations forces should not attempt to see the Yalu River again and should accept the limited objective in trying to free the Korean Republic. On the other side, it was probable but not certain that the enemy could not now expel the United Nations forces from Korea.

8. I met Franks immediately after seeing Rusk, and he took up with me the suggestion, which had been previously made to him, of three-cornered talks between the United States, United Kingdom and Canada, which he is anxious to see adopted. He thinks well of the general programme proposed by Rusk. Do you agree that I should participate in such discussions?

Your telegram WA-397 of February 1.

UNITED STATES FAR EASTERN POLICY

1. I was much encouraged by the sobriety of the views expressed by Rusk, as reported in your telegram under reference. It came as a very welcome change from the friendly but somewhat excited pressures to which we had been previously subjected. I was glad, in particular, to receive this evidence that the United States Administration is genuinely anxious to continue the work of negotiation with the Chinese Communists and is no longer thinking in terms of a limited war with China.

2. When you are in Ottawa, we can discuss the proposal that there should be three-cornered talks in Washington with the Americans and the British about the next steps that should be taken in Korea and the Far East. My present feeling is that such an exchange of views would be valuable. However, I think that they should be preceded, if possible, by an informal attempt on our part to sound out the State Department on the long-term objectives of their policy in the Far East. I have been concerned by what appears from here to be a lack of direction and consistency in their Far Eastern policy. A despatch which will go to you in tomorrow's bag elaborates this concern and suggests some of the fundamental questions to which I should like an answer. Once these questions had been answered, however tentatively, it would be easier to discuss profitably the next steps which should be taken.

3. If such three-cornered discussions are arranged, I assume that they will be kept entirely private and informal. Otherwise, of course, a number of other countries would consider, and with reason, that they had a good claim to be included.

4. The only difficulty I can foresee if we participate in such three-cornered discussions is that the Americans, after deferring to our wishes in some particulars, may consider that we are then under a moral obligation to support them in the United Nations and elsewhere, even though only some of our objections to their proposals may have been met. You may feel that this suspicion is unworthy and shows too cautious a determination to avoid commitments. My recent experience in New York, however, has convinced me that caution is necessary in any preliminary, informal talks. On several occasions after I had told the United States representatives there of my views on the United States resolution and when they had made a few changes in an effort to be conciliatory, I was confronted with the feeling that now I was expected to "lay Canadian support on the line" now that our objections had been met. Since our main objections had not been met, I found this method of doing business somewhat irritating. I therefore consider that if you participate in discussions with the Americans and the British, you should make it clear at the outset that, although we are more than willing to have a frank exchange of views with them on the course to be followed now that the People's Government has been formally condemned, we cannot regard ourselves as bound in any way by these discussions. Above all, you should tell them frankly that we are maintaining the right to determine our own attitude to whatever action may be proposed in the United Nations when the time comes to take such a decision.

5. I am looking forward to your visit to Ottawa which will give us a chance of thrashing out this whole question further.

DESPATCH Y-650 Ottawa, February 9, 1951

SECRET

Reference: My telegram No. EX-310 of February 9, 1951.

UNITED STATES FAR EASTERN POLICY

In view of the rapid drift in United States policy toward an irrevocable break with the Chinese Communists and of the danger of the United States adopting a policy of assisting the Chinese resistance movement on the mainland and of further rearming Chiang Kai-Shek, I think you should seek an early opportunity to discuss with the United States Government, at a high level, the long term objectives of their Far Eastern policy, in which we must inevitably be involved.

2. Since Mr. Acheson and other officials of the United States Government may feel that we have been giving them too much gratuitous advice lately on United States policy in the Far East, I do not think that at this stage we need to make suggestions to them on what their policy should be. You should instead do your best to draw them out. What follows in this despatch is material which I hope will be of use to you in doing this.

3. There may be some lessons to be drawn between our present position in relation to China and the situation which existed in 1939 when the Soviet Union attacked Finland. At that time it was plain that the Soviet attack was an outrageous betrayal of all the principles which underlay the international community and one had to define the Soviet action in those terms. Yet, it would have been disastrous if we had come into conflict with the Soviet Union over Finland, particularly when it was clear that the Soviet-German alliance was of the most opportunistic nature and that unless any precipitate action on our side had prevented it, these two powers were bound to fall out, thereby bringing Russian manpower to bear against Germany. The parallel obviously should not be pressed too far, especially since Sino-Soviet relations today are undoubtedly closer and more stable than Soviet-German relations in 1939-41. Nevertheless, the principle of keeping the eye on the main danger still holds good and any hostile action which we launch against China would only have the effect of strengthening the grip of the Communist regime upon the people on the one hand and increasing its dependence on the Soviet Government on the other.

4. Another instance of the wisdom of restraint can be adduced from the events in 1946 when the United States came very close to a break with Yugoslavia over the shooting down of a United States Army plane over that country. Precipitate action at that time might well have had the effect, if not of preventing, at least of postponing the breach between Tito and the Soviet Union.

5. We think it is now a fitting time to review the events leading up to the vote of January 30 and to frame a policy for the next stage. The main burden of responsibility for framing a constructive policy for that stage rests on the United States. It is therefore essential for us to know as precisely as we can what present United States objectives are as regards the Far East in general and China in particular.

6. The Canadian Government and people have, as you know, been deeply concerned during the past seven months over some aspects of United States Far Eastern policy. If a policy is coherent and logical, even if one disagrees with it, it may still command respect but some aspects of recent United States policy have seemed to us erratic and confused. At times it has been difficult for the Canadian Government to discover exactly what the current United States policy is. There have been occasions when, within a comparatively brief period, we have been given or have noted in the press statements by persons claiming to speak on behalf of the United States Government which have been conflicting or indeed contradictory. Dean Rusk has been wise and restrained but his expositions of United States policy have not always been consistent with public or private expositions by officers of equal or higher rank in the Administration, such as Hickerson, Gross or Austin. MacArthur's statements have, of course, added to the confusion.

7. This, plus outbursts of impatience and tactlessness, and the absence of any clear-cut sense of direction, both in the forming and carrying out of current United States policy, have, as you know, caused some differences between the United States and their Western allies. These differences are, however, even wider with certain Eastern governments, especially India.

8. I hope that we can now assume that the State Department has discarded all ideas of limited war with Communist China and that it may even share our doubts about the effectiveness and desirability of sanctions of any kind against China. We have never, however, so far as I am aware, been assured that Mr. Acheson has given up his advocacy of limited war. Even if ideas of limited war have been abandoned by the Administration, the outlines of an alternative United States policy have not yet emerged. I realize, of course, that this emergence is not going to be easy and will take some time. But I hope that the outlines of it will soon appear.

9. An alternative policy would have been to explore the possibilities of negotiation. The United States, however, not only pushed through the Assembly a resolution condemning China as an aggressor, but also gave the impression during the debate at Lake Success and even more in Washington that they were anxious to seize on the first Chinese reply to the statement of principles of January 27 as an excuse for withdrawing from their own commitment to those principles. One could only deduce from this that the United States had no real desire to enter into negotiations with China at that time.

10. We ourselves remained convinced throughout that negotiations with China should be our objective and condemnation voted only as a last resort. Nevertheless, in view of our recent experience at Lake Success we are not now prepared to lend our support to any plan for negotiations unless we are certain that the United States intends to work for their success. That is one reason why I did not accept the invitation to serve on the Good Offices Committee. It seems to me that it would be better to abandon for the immediate future all plans for negotiation than to enter into negotiations which are clearly foredoomed to failure. An early breakdown of negotiation, particularly if it arose from United States inflexibility or impatience, might finally convince the Chinese that their only hope lay in complete dependence on the Soviet Union. No doubt such a development would be welcomed in certain quarters in Peking and we should be careful not to facilitate it. I should think, therefore, that for the immediate future it might be wise to fall back, if possible, on diplomatic machinery outside the Good Offices Committee in an effort to bridge the gap between Washington and Peking. I doubt if the Good Offices Committee, tied up as it is with the resolution of condemnation, can do very much at this stage, though it may be very useful later.

11. It is important that we know what objectives the United States would seek in any negotiations. Would the United States subscribe to the following or would they suggest others:

(i) Localization of the war in Korea and, if possible its liquidation;

(ii) Prevention or postponement of Chinese Communist attacks on Indonesia, Malaya, Hong Kong, Burma, etc.;

(iii) As a corollary of the above, the retention of the access to areas of raw materials vital both to the West and to non-Communist Asian countries;

(iv) Agreement that our objective in the Far East is the defeat of aggression and not the use of the United Nations to overthrow Communist Governments;

(v) Elimination of the danger of our being drawn into a lengthy and perhaps indecisive military struggle with Chinese Communism when we have accepted the axiom that Western Europe should be the principal area of our defensive effort;

(vi) The desirability of doing everything possible to drive a wedge between Communist China and the U.S.S.R.; as a step towards this end, the opening up of China to our diplomatic and economic influences; and

(vii) Finally, and following from the above, stabilizing the Far East.

12. Even the partial achievement of these objectives would tend to strengthen friendly relations between the West and the non-Communist East which recent United States tactics have strained. The United States Administration must be aware that their recent policy has noticeably dismayed and vexed some of our potential friends in non-Communist Asia. Take the case of India, for example, the most important nation in this group. We think that India, though its reaction to Chinese intervention in Korea has seemed to the United States to be timid and wrong, has served as a useful channel of communication with Communist China and that we should look to the Indians for continued help if negotiations with China are to succeed. Yet the kind of misrepresentation of Indian motives given by Senator Austin in his speech of January 22 and the implicit threat of economic pressure made recently by Senator Connally will certainly not induce in India a spirit more co-operative with the aims of United States diplomacy.

13. We are, we hope, under no illusions about Mr. Nehru or Indian policy. We do not look upon the present Indian leadership as being the heir to all the Wisdom of the East, nor do we view all Indian proposals as realistic, as we showed by abstaining on the Asian resolution. At the same time, we believe that in the present circumstances we can hope for no more sympathetic or helpful administration in that country, which is still in a formative condition.

14. We consider that in the present lull in the diplomatic front it is up to the United States Government, following the vote of January 30, to indicate to countries such as Canada what they envisage as the next step and particularly whether they can hold out any positive hopes that negotiations with China will bear fruit. In entering such negotiations the United States would hold a comparatively favourable position. The chief factors in United States bargaining strength would include the following:

(i) The rapid increase of United States military strength, and the consequent shrinking of the military liability arising from the Korean operations;

(ii) The present United States control of Formosa;

(iii) The increasingly strong position of the United Nations forces in Korea and what appears to be now some strengthening of the French position in Indo-China;

(iv) The desire of the Chinese to participate in talks on the Japanese peace settlement;

(v) The desire of the Chinese Communist Government for recognition and entry into the United Nations; and

(vi) A factor on which there is still considerable doubt, the desire of Communist China, even at this late date, to avoid war with the United States.

15. In regard to point (vi) above, we would appreciate a State Department assessment on an important problem, which we feel is still unsolved, namely, the extent of Soviet influence on China, particularly on the conduct of the Korean aggression, and more generally, whether the Soviet Union is exercising a restraining hand upon Chinese Communist expansionist ambitions or pressing China forward. The answer to this, it seems to us, depends in large part on a calculation of the extent of the risks of a general war this year which the Soviet Union is prepared to run.

16. We are not blind to the powerful position which the Chinese would enjoy at a conference table as a result of their vast armies, their strategic location in regard to Korea and Indo-China and their backing by the military might of the Soviet Union. It seems to us, however, that the United States and Communist China through a realistic appraisal of both their own and others' strength could cautiously enter into a series of arrangements which would be in effect a wary and tortuous process of disengagement on both sides from the fixed positions in which each party has entrenched itself. If this process can only be commenced and followed up, even with all the disappointments and problems it would involve, we consider that it offers the only hope for a lessening of tensions and in the long run a comparative stabilization of the Far East. The chances of success of such negotiations, we realize, are slender. Chief among the difficulties, of course, are the fanatic marxist obsessions of Chinese Communist leaders and the excitable state of public opinion in the United States. Nevertheless, it is the task of diplomacy to pursue patiently and doggedly what appears to be the only sensible course.

17. During your discussions with the United States Government at a high level on the long term objectives of their policy in the Far East, I should be grateful if you would take advantage of any opportunity which presents itself to make clear that, while we have over the past seven months differed from the United States on their Far Eastern policy, and while we continue to have apprehensions about the drift of their policy in the Far East, the Canadian Government and people are fully conscious of the great debt of gratitude which they owe to the United States, and particularly to Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson for the way in which they have, during the past seven months, rallied the whole of the free world to defend its common liberties against the increasing danger of Soviet aggression. Three years ago when the Communists seized Czechoslovakia, the United States and its fellow-members of the North Atlantic Community embarked on a process of strengthening their armed forces and their unity. Looking back at this period of the last three years, it is clear that up to the time of the attack on Korea last summer none of us in the North Atlantic Community was moving fast enough. The result, I am afraid, was that, instead of the gap between our strength and the Soviet strength narrowing, it was in fact widening and the inevitable result would have been disaster. This suicidal policy has been reversed because of United States leadership under Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson, and latterly General Marshall. The United States has with courage and imagination seized the opportunity which was presented by the developments in Korea to double and later to quadruple its defence effort and has carried its North Atlantic allies with it. The result is that for the first time since the end of hostilities there is good reason for believing that time is on our side and that if we continue with our present defence policies and pursue a patient, restrained and firm diplomacy, we may succeed in averting war and finally in reaching a tolerable modus vivendi with the Soviet Union.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Repeat Washington No. 138.
Reference paragraph 2 of my teletype No. 196† — Committee on Additional Measures for Korea.

1. Coulson of the United Kingdom delegation has today shown me copy of a telegram from London containing the instructions to the United Kingdom delegation regarding the study of sanctions against China by the Additional Measures Committee. You will no doubt have already received a copy of these instructions from Earnscliffe. Briefly they boil down to rejection by the United Kingdom Government of all the United States proposals for either economic or diplomatic sanctions against China by the United Nations.

2. So far as organization of the Committee on Additional Measures is concerned, I understand from Coulson that the United Kingdom now believe that Sarper or Muniz will be Chairman, with possibly Fawzi Bey or Gonzalez (Venezuela) as Vice-Chairman, and with Shann as rapporteur. The United Kingdom thinking is that once the bureau is formed, the Committee should adjourn for a period of perhaps three weeks while the bureau (not, repeat not, the Secretariat as mentioned in paragraph 2 of my teletype No. 196) prepares proposals for the Committee's consideration. During these three weeks it would be understood that the bureau would receive a good deal of guidance from the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations, and possibly ourselves, in order to ensure that the proposals when finally submitted to the Committee would be ones which the major contributing States had already agreed to.

3. In view of the fact that the United Kingdom and United States Governments are now so sharply divided regarding the question of sanctions, it seems to me that there might be something to be gained by trying to switch the emphasis in the Additional Measures Committee from the question of sanctions against China to the question of additional measures in securing United Nations objectives in Korea, at least in the early stages of this work. The resolution adopted by the Assembly made it clear that the charge against the Chinese Communist Government was that it was assisting in an aggression which had already taken place in Korea. The operative paragraph concerned reads: "The General Assembly finds that the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China, by giving direct aid and assistance to those who were already committing aggression in Korea and by engaging in hostilities against United Nations forces there, has itself engaged in aggression in Korea." By paragraph 8, the new committee is requested as a matter of urgency to consider additional measures to be employed to meet this aggression. It can be argued that the "additional measures" which the Committee should consider are, therefore, in the first instance, any measures which might contribute to resisting the Korean aggression — i.e., not specifically the question of sanctions against China.

4. I am not sure that it would be possible to get support for this interpretation of the Committee's mandate, especially in view of the prevalent demand for sanctions against China. It might also be inexpedient to raise in the Committee questions concerning military assistance in Korea, and I am not sure what other additional measures, apart from contributions of shipping, food, etc. could be considered. I should add also that Coulson of the United Kingdom delegation, who is the only person to whom I have mentioned this possible approach, was singularly unimpressed (repeat, unimpressed) with it. Unless we devise some fresh approach, however, we will be confronted in this Committee with the stubborn and unreconciled opposition of United Kingdom and United States objectives.

5. I should be grateful for instructions as to the line we should adopt when it becomes necessary to consider the substance of the Committee's mandate, as distinct from procedure, either in the Committee or a private discussion. The Committee meets on Wednesday next, February 14th, at 11 a.m.

TELEGRAM EX-331 Ottawa, February 13, 1951

TOP SECRET. MOST IMMEDIATE.

We have been considering urgently the attitude we should adopt with respect to possible movement of UN forces north of the 38th parallel. Although the military situation now seems to make this question less immediate it has been raised in Parliament and this afternoon I propose to answer a question (by Mr. Coldwell) concerning the government's attitude along the lines of the immediately following paragraph of this message.

2. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that the Unified Command should not order its troops north of the 38th parallel until there has been consultation with the United Nations especially with those countries which have contributed forces for use in Korea.

3. Please inform the U.S. Secretary of State immediately of the government's attitude as set forth in the preceding paragraph. You should add that, in the Canadian government's view, this restriction should include South Korean forces.

4. In my answer in the House this afternoon I will state that you have been instructed to communicate to Mr. Acheson in the above sense.

5. You will of course have noticed that the U.K. government have taken the same position and Mr. Attlee has so stated it in the House of Commons.

6. In telegram 314 of February 7† from the High Commissioner in London (referred to you by bag), Rusk was quoted as being of the opinion that the United Nations forces should not proceed north of the 38th parallel. As you know, in response to a United States invitation the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff sent to the United States an appreciation of the military situation in Korea in which they recommended that the United Nations forces should hold a line across the narrow part of Korea just south of the 38th parallel, covering Inchon and Seoul.

7. With respect to the South Koreans, news reports Sunday night stated that South Korean forces had crossed the parallel as far as Yangyang on the east coast. We realize that, when the question of crossing the 38th parallel arose after the successful Inchon landing, MacArthur stated that he would control the non-Korean forces but that he could not prevent the South Korean forces from crossing the parallel if they wished. This statement was not effectively challenged at that time because of concentration on the activities of the main body of MacArthur's forces. It seems to us therefore that this point should be taken up before the situation gets out of hand. We fail to understand how MacArthur can contend that he cannot control the South Korean troops who are in fact under his command. Without support from the United States the South Koreans could not hope to maintain themselves north of the 38th parallel or south of it. Therefore, before the South Koreans, presumably with at least the tacit assent of the Unified Command, commit us to a return north of the parallel, it would we think be advisable to have a clear understanding with the United States government that the Unified Command will not exercise its discretionary authority to order an advance north of the parallel until there have been full discussions with all the powers having forces in Korea. Such discussions, of course, should serve to clarify the Far East generally.

8. We realize that, from time to time, it may be necessary for the United Nations forces to engage in patrol activity or make some local tactical moves north of the 38th parallel for example to protect some particularly vital position south of it. Such action should not, however, in our opinion be used as an excuse for making territorial gains beyond the line.

9. Paragraphs 1 to 5 inclusive of this telegram confirm our telephone conversation earlier this morning.

TELEGRAM WA-574 Washington, February 13, 1951

TOP SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Your EX-331 of February 13th, possible passage of 38th parallel.

1. Before I received your message I had already spoken to Rusk on the basis of my telephone conversation with Heeney. At this afternoon's meeting of countries contributing forces to Korea I enquired about MacArthur's control of ROK forces and was assured that they were fully under his command. I shall seek further verification. We were definitely told on the basis of today's official report from Tokyo that there has been no crossing of the parallel on the east coast and that the report of its passage by units of the ROK capital division was erroneous.

2. You have doubtless received the full text of MacArthur's statement of today, issued after inspecting the battlefront. [24] This is reassuring, at any rate in so far as the possibility goes of any major operations in North Korea in the near future.

3. There will be a further discussion on this subject at Friday's meeting at the State Department, at which Rusk will report on the latest developments and the views of the Chiefs of Staff. Questions were asked today about the consultations with countries with forces in Korea. It was stated that no such consultations had been or would be held in New York, but that the State Department meetings or individual diplomatic approaches were being employed.

4. I think it is necessary to adopt a fairly flexible attitude on this issue, mainly for the reasons set forth in paragraphs 5 and 6 of our WA-562 of February 12th.† Certainly the Unified Command cannot publicly commit itself to keep its ground forces south of the parallel without giving the enemy a distinct tactical advantage. If it were known that United Nations ground forces would refrain from entering North Korea, the effect would be to extend in some measure the "sanctuary" of which MacArthur so often complains to the 38th parallel, although, of course, air and naval operations could continue above it. It would also become unnecessary for the enemy to deploy forces to prevent amphibious landings above the parallel.

5. The case for keeping the enemy guessing is thus strong. All that we can legitimately demand, I think, is that prior private consultation should take place before the parallel is crossed by other than occasional patrol forces. I should be glad to learn whether you agree with this view.

6. In your message you suggest that before any advance north of the parallel there should be "full discussions with all the powers having forces in Korea". What form do you think such consultation should take? There are now some twelve countries with forces there, and experience here shows that the meetings of their Ambassadors at the State Department are not well suited for debating delicate and secret issues. When supplemented by ordinary diplomatic contacts, however, these meetings are probably as good an occasion as can be devised. Ends.

TOP SECRET Washington, February 16, 1951

Dear Mr. Pearson:

This letter and its enclosure are a partial reply to your despatch No. Y.650 of February 9th asking me to seek information on the objectives of the Far Eastern policy of the United States. The enclosure is my note of a long discussion on February 14th on this subject with Mr. Dean Rusk. I had originally intended to follow up a talk with Mr. Rusk by seeking an early interview with Mr. Acheson, but I now feel it better to postpone seeing him until I have had an opportunity of talking over with you the results of my meeting with Mr. Rusk.

I am giving this report to you in an informal manner because it is of such a character that it is unwise that it should receive in the Department even the treatment accorded to top secret papers. Mr. Rusk emphasized at several points that what he was telling me was for your and my information only.

I think that you will agree that Mr. Rusk's explanation gives a more coherent account of the policy towards China than anything that we have previously received. It also throws a good deal of light on the reasons why the tactics of the United States representatives have been at times disingenuous and inconsistent. Mr. Rusk states that the belief or hope that the attitude of the Peking Government may be changed by some kind of upheaval within the regime is based on very secret intelligence. A public avowal of their aim would tend to prevent its fulfilment, and they are not in a position to give their reasons even in strictest secrecy to more than a very few trusted people. I am not sure, for instance, whether Mr. Austin and Mr. Gross have been fully informed. Hence, any public explanation of their policy must be so incomplete as to be misleading.

While it is a relief for us to secure a rational explanation such as that given by Mr. Rusk, we are inevitably at a disadvantage in assessing its possibility of success, since this could only be determined by access to the secret intelligence which is determining U.S. thinking or by the availability of other good intelligence sources inside China. We must, in short, take what we are told either with skepticism or as providing a real chance of success. Furthermore, we are not in a position to give even the slightest public indication of what the present aim of the United States in Peking is.

In your despatch you emphasize the objectives to be sought in any Far Eastern negotiations. I think from what Mr. Rusk has told me and from my discussions with others here that the United States would endorse the objectives listed in paragraph 11 of the despatch and would agree that they can only be attained through eventual negotiations with the Peking Government. They would, however, in my judgment take the position that unless there were changes in that regime a negotiation aimed to achieve these objectives would not only be fruitless but would solidify the Moscow-Peking axis; they are therefore looking for time in the hope that internal pressures in Peking will before long reach a bursting point. If the present pattern of fighting in Korea can be maintained, with hugely disproportionate Chinese losses, this should in their view hasten the desired development inside the Chinese Communist Party.

The outcome they hope for seems to be neither the evolution of Mao-tze-tung into a Chinese Tito nor the transformation of the Chinese Communists into agrarian reformers. It appears to be rather the overthrow or submergence of the leaders whose first loyalty seems to be rather to Moscow than to the Chinese revolution, and their replacement by others who would be Communists still but with a definite nationalist slant. I did not get as far as this in my talk with Mr. Rusk, so that this is my own deduction.

Yours sincerely,

Compte rendu d'une conversation entre le secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires de l'Extrême-Orient des États-Unis et l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis

Record of Conversation between Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs of United States and Ambassador in United States

This paper should be treated with the greatest care and shown only to the minimum number of senior officers.

I had a long talk with Mr. Dean Rusk in order to discuss with him the objectives of United States policy in Korea and the Far East on the general lines proposed in Ottawa despatch No. Y.650 of February 9th. Mr. Rusk, who has always been frank with me, on this occasion spoke more freely than ever before about some of the considerations guiding the policy of the United States. He gave me certain details not set forth in this paper on the understanding that I would only pass them verbally to Mr. Pearson. He asked me not to reveal to the Secretary of State that he had given me these details.

The first question which I asked him was whether the idea of a limited war with Communist China had been abandoned. He answered that a limited war was now going on in Korea. No shot had been fired against China on purpose outside Korea in spite of intense provocation. This had involved the exercise of "almost inconceivable restraint". Any extension of the area of the fighting would only arise because of actions which might be taken by the Chinese, such as extensive air operations from Manchuria or armed attacks on U.S. forces elsewhere. The United States did not intend to take steps which would make incidents involving U.S. and Chinese forces more probable; for example, in considering economic measures against China they rejected the idea of a blockade of the coast and favoured instead embargoes on shipments without enforcement by naval search and seizure.

In Korea there were five conceivable ways in which the fighting could be brought to an end. First, all Korea could be unified by force through defeat of the enemy forces; that solution had seemed likely until the massive intervention of the Chinese, but it was now out of the question. Secondly, the United Nations forces might wholly withdraw from Korea voluntarily or under enemy pressure; this solution was also rejected as it would endanger the entire position of the free countries in the Far East and especially in Japan. Thirdly, the Korean war could be liquidated by the forcible liquidation of the Peking regime; there is no thought of seeking any such solution, and it was realized that it could only be achieved as a result of a war between China and the United States unsupported by other countries. Fourthly, there might be a military stalemate; this was a possibility but a dubious one in present circumstances and would not be adopted by choice; it would mean the maintenance of substantial forces in Korea for a long period facing Chinese and North Korean forces on the other side of a military line. Finally, there was the possibility of settlement by agreement, which would be the best solution; they see, however, no prospect of an early agreed settlement and we should not be in any hurry in the present military circumstances to try to achieve it.

Mr. Rusk told me in the strictest confidence that the directive under which General MacArthur was operating was defensive in nature. His instructions were to adopt "a strategic posture of defence". No major military effort was to be made to capture the territory now held by the enemy south of the 38th Parallel. He hoped that the United Nations forces would remain about where they were. When their withdrawal was under way from the positions reached at the time of the Chinese intervention various holding lines had been planned, known as lines A, B, C, D, E and F. The withdrawal had reached line D (in the vicinity of the 37th Parallel) in January and there had then been little expectation that the troops would move forward. General Ridgway's limited offensive has been brilliantly conducted with tremendous losses to the enemy, but no serious military risks would be undertaken to capture more Korean real estate. The present position on the western flank along the south bank of the Han River is a good holding position and it was unlikely that there would be any early effort to capture Seoul, which if taken would mean that the U.N. forces would have the Han River at their backs.

The intention therefore was to do as much damage as possible to the enemy forces at the lowest cost, in conditions in which the superior equipment and fire power of the U.N. forces could be brought to bear. They would continue to jab and strike at the enemy and this would probably involve the crossing of the 38th Parallel at times by offensive patrols or by commando raids, such as the raid just conducted on Wonsan. Any such crossings, however, would be for temporary military reasons in order to further the design of crippling the enemy as much as possible. Mr. Rusk did not rule out the possibility that a slice of North Korean territory might be occupied for a time for bargaining purposes. For example, if Seoul were still in Chinese hands the possession of a stretch of North Korean territory, perhaps on the east coast, might prove to be valuable in negotiating a cease-fire with the 38th Parallel as a boundary line, since this would then involve a mutual evacuation.

Our discussion then turned to the longer term purposes of United States policy towards the Peking Government, and this was the most interesting part of our talk. I started it by saying that it seemed to me that the difficulties in working out an agreed policy between the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada and other free countries centered around the answer to a question which might be framed as: "Is the United States reconciled to the continued existence of the Peking Government for some time or is its aim to overthrow the Peking Government?" Mr. Rusk agreed that this was the central issue, and remarked that there had been very little discussion of it between the governments concerned. He went on to give me some very secret information on what was guiding the policy of the United States.

The United States, he said, considers the existence of the Peking regime disadvantageous to the Western world and does not intend to do anything which would have the effect of consolidating its authority in China. He did not believe that Peking could be wooed away from Moscow by making concessions now on the issues on which the Peking Government was demanding the adoption of their views, such as the handing over of Formosa and seating in the U.N. The United States, in short, wished the existing regime in Peking to fall but they did not intend to undertake any overt commitment to bring it down. They could, however, do something to confuse and impede its activities.

He went on to tell me some of the reasons which led them to believe that such a policy might succeed — reasons which he asked me not to put on paper. These led to the view that the present regime was not nearly as monolithic as it might appear. There are factions inside the regime which are much disturbed about the relations with Moscow. Recent intelligence gave some reason to believe, for example, that even the Chinese military commands in Manchuria and Korea had been separated from the control under Peking of the north China theatre and had been placed under the direction of the Soviet Siberian theatre command. Elements in Peking resented the Russian penetration of Manchuria, and there was evidence that Russian advisers were interesting themselves in all sorts of detailed matters. It was probable that all Chinese purchases abroad had now to receive Russian approval. Developments such as these and awareness of purges throughout the Communist sphere were creating lively apprehensions among these elements.

Mr. Rusk said that the main purpose of their present policy towards Peking was "to get China unhooked from Russia". The chief changes in world power in the last two years arose from Russian possession of the atomic bomb and the addition of China to the Russian sphere. He believed that the end of unhooking China from Russia would be best achieved by making those in Peking realize the cost of living with the U.S.S.R. In Peking the pro-Moscow elements in the Communist Party are now on top, but there is a strong nationalist element. It would probably take some time before the balance could change, and one could not guess in advance what would be effective in changing the balance. He suggested, however, that a difference might be made by the defeat of the 4th Chinese field army now engaged in Korea, the commander of which was a strong supporter of the Moscow-Peking axis. He added that the position of the commanders of the Chinese field armies in some degree resembled that of the former war lords in China.

The current appreciation in the State Department of the extent of Soviet influence on China is that it is now very great and that Moscow therefore is playing a controlling part in Chinese actions in Korea. China, however, is the weakest part of the whole Communist sphere and the area most likely to break off from Soviet domination. Concessions to current Chinese demands would strengthen the position of the elements in Peking who are most subservient to Moscow.

I then brought up the question of the continued recognition by the United States of Chiang Kai-Shek asking in view of what Mr. Rusk had said about the possibilities of the Peking regime itself, through some internal convulsion, changing its direction whether the support for Chiang was in the nature of a blind. He agreed that this was partly the case, remarking that there were very few in Washington who expected that control of the mainland could ever be recovered by the Chinese Nationalists. In reply to a question he said that it was probable that the chief purpose of those now in control in Peking in demanding a seat in the U.N. and the return of Formosa was to secure the disappearance of Chiang Kai-Shek as leader of an alternative government. Meanwhile, refusal to meet these demands in any way was an effective means of exercising pressure inside the Peking regime; those in Peking who wished to break away from Moscow would not welcome at this stage the de-recognition of Chiang by the United States — presumably because they could now blame on Russian interference the failure to attain legitimate Chinese aspirations.

We turned then to the consideration of the extent of agreement possible between the Western allies in the light of Mr. Rusk's explanations. He said that it was easy to see agreement with the United Kingdom, Canada and other countries on the desirability of aiming for a cease-fire in Korea on the line of the 38th Parallel and, as the next step, the establishment of a modus vivendi in Korea which would involve a return to the territorial situation of last June and the withdrawal of foreign forces. If, however, we went on from there to a conference on Far Eastern questions, he did not at present see how agreement could be reached even among the Western powers on what the outcome should be. The United States would not make any promises in advance involving concessions on the main issues. For the reasons given he believed that such very desirable purposes as the prevention of Communist attacks on other Asian territories would best be achieved by their aim of working for a great change of direction in Peking, rather than by seeking commitments at a conference in which the Russians and the present masters in Peking would be seated.

I then said that a great deal in his explanation was new to me. It seemed to me that there was no fundamental difference between the purposes of United States policy in the Far East as he put them and the purposes of the British, insofar as I understood them, and of Canada. The difference related to the method of encouraging the "unhooking" of Peking from Moscow. Why should there not be a frank discussion with the British? Mr. Rusk said he did not believe it possible for such a discussion to take place at present, although if Mr. Bevin were able to return in good shape to the Foreign Office something might then be done. He remarked on what he called the "little England" attitude of the Labour Government and their over-concentration on domestic affairs, and he left me with the impression that he had exposed to me the thinking of the State Department more fully than had been done to any representative of the United Kingdom.

At the close of our lengthy talk I read to him most of paragraph 17 of your despatch expressing admiration and appreciation for the leadership given by the United States since the Korean outbreak in strengthening the forces of the Western world. He remarked that, putting on one side the compliments, he believed that the conclusions drawn in your despatch were true and encouraging and that with patience and firmness we might avoid war and discover some method of living tolerably in the same world as the Soviet Union.

KOREA

Late yesterday (Thursday) I called on Lie, who is leaving Saturday on a fortnight's visit to South America. He will be in Chile for the opening of ECOSOC, and will return by way of Ecuador and Peru. I asked him about Korea, the Disarmament Committee and one or two other topics on which I am reporting in this and my immediately following teletypes.†

2. Concerning Korea, Lie said that Entezam had now formed his Good Offices Committee, but had delayed announcing it or indeed even formally constituting it. He had, meanwhile sent a message to Peking through the Swedish Embassy. In this message he had informed Peking that he had selected two persons to assist him with his work of good offices, that the functions of good offices group could be performed either by the group as a whole or by any members of it, and that he, in his capacity as President, was prepared to meet a representative of the Chinese Government either in New York or Geneva, or to have his representative go to Peking to meet the Chinese authorities, and by one of these methods, to ascertain their views concerning the possibility of working out a Far Eastern settlement. I am not sure of the actual phrasing of the message, but Entezam appears to have done precisely what you suggested to him ten days ago, except that he has taken the preliminary step of selecting though not formally constituting his cease fire group.

13. Mr. Norman. The Additional Measures Committee met for the first time during the past week to organize its activities for carrying out the provisions of the General Assembly resolution condemning China. It decided to maintain close contact with the Good Offices Committee; it did not discuss sanctions against China. The Canadian representative was instructed to take the same stand as the United Kingdom representative on the question of sanctions, i.e., that any attempt to impose economic or diplomatic sanctions should be resisted. TOP SECRET Washington, February 23, 1951

Dear Mr. Pearson[25]

Mr. Rusk suggested that I have a talk with him this afternoon after one of the meetings of Ambassadors at the State Department, and I therefore took the opportunity of going over with him some of the matters which arose during our discussions in Ottawa this week, especially with reference to your consideration of my report of my talk with Mr. Rusk on February 14th which I handed to you in Ottawa on Monday morning.

I sought to lead him into developing further the evidence in the possession of the United States Government about the balance of forces inside the Peking Government. I was not very successful in this, and although he repeated the general observations which he had made at our previous talk he did not amplify them significantly. He pointed out, however, that public reports were coming in today from Peking about internal difficulties in China. He would not go so far as to say that he had a "reasonable hope" that the nationalist elements would supersede or get control of the pro-Moscow forces within a few months, although he thought that there was enough chance of this taking place to warrant some waiting on events. He added that the position should be rather clearer in a month or so.

He agreed when I said that his explanation of the basis of U.S. policy seemed to show that the differences with the British in particular were over means rather than ends. The withdrawal of recognition from Chiang Kai-Shek, for example, would in his judgment be acclaimed inside China as a considerable victory for those now in power and therefore would strengthen their hold. I told him that some thought had been given in Ottawa to a Canadian withdrawal of recognition but that I judged from my discussions there that consideration of this step would be deferred for some weeks.[26]

I then brought up again the desirability of a frank and private exchange of views with the British Government. He once more referred to their hesitation in undertaking this at the present time because of some of the personalities involved. While he did not specify, he seemed to have in mind the left-wing members of the government and the frequent criticisms of the United States which have been coming from their supporters in the Labour Party. He remarked that they had not talked to anyone in London as freely as he had spoken to me but they would probably feel able to do so if Mr. Bevin was fit enough to assume real control of the Foreign Office again. He said that he might himself make a quick trip to London before long.

I asked him about the suggestion for private three-cornered talks here on Far Eastern affairs inquiring whether it was still alive. He said that he thought it was. If so, it will not be followed up for some days as Mr. Acheson is leaving this afternoon for a holiday in Bermuda.

I then asked about their attitude in the event of a Chinese move into Indo-China. He told me that there were some Chinese already in Indo-China although the French had not publicly admitted this. Chinese had been killed in action and a few prisoners had been taken. If the intervention became really strong he thought it would be impossible for the French to defend Tonkin although they might be able to hold out in the strong redoubt of Haiphong for a considerable period. There was no possibility of the United States providing ground forces and it was doubtful whether air strikes from carriers could do sufficient damage. He believed it unlikely that the French would bring the issue before the United Nations, as they would be unsure of the votes. He left me with the impression that the United States would not take the initiative in such a case and also that they had not got very far in their consideration of various courses of action.

He went on to say that their estimate of Chinese military capabilities was that if they went all out they were strong enough in time to deal with Indo-China, Korea and Hong Kong. They took the possible threat to Hong Kong more seriously than the British. He showed me a telegram just received from their man there passing on reports of substantial Chinese troop movements to the Hong Kong region. Their conclusion from their current intelligence is that intervention in Hong Kong and in Indo-China, or in one or the other of them, is more likely than an attack on Formosa.

He remarked that an attack on Hong Kong would bring to an end the current differences on policy between the British and the Americans, which would be to Chinese disadvantage. He thought, however, that inside China it might well solidify the supporters of the Peking regime and ease the present strains and stresses. They might think that this would make an attack worthwhile.

I told him that the decision announced on Wednesday to send the balance of the Special Force to Korea had been taken immediately and without argument as soon as the Government had received a clear indication of the wishes of the Unified Command.[27] He was very pleased to hear this and said he would pass it on to Mr. Acheson if I had no objection before Mr. Acheson's departure today.

If after considering this letter there are further questions you would like me to put to the State Department, it would be helpful to me if you would list them in a letter or message to me. I am enclosing a copy of this letter which you might be good enough to pass to Mr. Heeney.

Yours sincerely,

H.H. WRONG

P.S. They are puzzled about the absence of Russian equipment among the Chinese forces in Korea. Apparently none has been identified with the Chinese. Rusk said that the explanation might be that the Russians were only providing equipment on a barter or payment basis which the Chinese were unable to meet. From documents taken last year in Pyongyang they had found that there had been no free delivery of Russian equipment to North Korea.

He remarked that they were ready to talk more freely with you than with anybody now operating in London. If we do get into high level private talks here, we might manage to arrange a discussion when you take a holiday at Easter. Franks is leaving for London on March 3rd before Acheson gets back from Bermuda, but I think that he will be back by about the time you might be coming this way.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

After returning from Ottawa, I suggested to Shann of the Australian delegation and to Jebb that consideration might be given to approaching the work of the Additional Measures Committee by concentrating in the first instance on additional measures that might be undertaken to fulfil United Nations purposes in Korea. I added that in this way it might also be possible to limit the effect of any general measures which might subsequently be contemplated. For example, if a general recommendation to member states is contemplated for the purpose of preventing military supplies reaching the Chinese, this recommendation could be formulated as a measure to prevent military supplies reaching the forces engaged in the aggression in Korea. Action for this purpose would necessarily prevent military supplies going to China, without China being specifically mentioned in any Assembly resolution.

2. I hesitated to make this suggestion to the United States delegation until I had gained some idea as to whether or not it would be acceptable to other delegations. I now find, however, that Jebb, in a meeting with the United States delegation late last week, told the United States delegation that we were proposing to follow the line indicated in paragraph 1 of this telegram, and said that we hoped the United Kingdom would give us very strong support. I am not quite clear how the United States delegation took this information, and I have not yet had an opportunity to speak to any of them about it myself.

3. The United Kingdom delegation has been instructed to urge that the Additional Measures Committee should concern itself in the first instance with diplomatic measures. Their idea is that this will occupy time, and that since there will be no agreement as to any diplomatic measures that might be taken, the effect will be to delay the progress of the work. This procedure seems to me to have dangers, and I think that they are now asking for new instructions which would enable them to follow the line which we have suggested.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

I spoke to Gross on February 28th about the work of the Additional Measures Committee. He said that the United States delegation was disappointed over the course of action which the bureau of this committee (as outlined in my teletype No. 263 of February 28th)† was proposing to take. If the bureau brought in a report outlining all conceivable additional measures that might be considered, and the task of making a selection amongst these measures was referred to a sub-committee which included the United Kingdom, United States, and France, the effect might be exactly the opposite of what was desired. In the public mind, the full list, as prepared by the bureau, might become the norm or standard upon which action should be based. Any selection amongst these measures would in that case be regarded as a watering down of the full program. The expectation might then be built up that the full program as outlined in the bureau's report would gradually be put into effect. The Chinese Communists on the other hand would regard the full list as prepared by the bureau as a catalogue of horrors which was being brandished at them but which the United Nations was not immediately putting into effect because it lacked either the will or the ability to do so.

2. I told Gross that we had been concerned about the course of action which the Additional Measures Committee should follow. It seemed to us that the difference of opinion about additional measures which were both desirable and practicable was so great that the debates which had taken place in the First Committee during the Korean resolution might be repeated both in the committee and subsequently in the Assembly with the same divisive consequences. In the end it might be impossible to secure in the Assembly the adoption of a recommendation for additional measures which would have any material effect on the position of the Chinese Communists. In these circumstances, we would get the worst of the matter both ways. We would have had a disagreeable debate and a divided vote, and we would have gone through the motions of disciplining the Chinese without seriously impeding their aggressive activities. For this reason we had been wondering whether the committee should not consider, in the first instance, the possibility of recommending measures to support the United Nations resistance to aggression in Korea, rather than consider measures to discipline the Chinese. In some respects, this might produce the same result though terms would be used which could be generally supported. For example, many Asian states might be unwilling to vote for an arms embargo against China. On the other hand they would find it difficult to vote against a recommendation that member states take the necessary steps to prevent arms reaching forces which were committing aggression in Korea. If the United States delegation insisted on discussing diplomatic measures, the same considerations might apply in that case. States which would be unwilling to vote in favour of freezing the present situation in regard to representation of Communist China as a sanction, might be prepared to support a recommendation to the effect that, while the aggression in Korea continued, consideration should not be given to the representation in the United Nations of authorities, not at present represented, who supported that aggression.

3. Gross said that as far as the first of these considerations was concerned (the divisive effect of the debate on the vote), they had been inclined to think that the result at the end of the debate on the Korean resolution of detaching some of the Arab states from the Asian bloc, and of separating Indonesia and Pakistan on the one hand from Burma and India on the other, had been far from discouraging. He thought that the violence which the Soviet bloc had shown in denouncing the resolution, including the language used by Stalin who had felt that he personally must come out against it, had demonstrated the effectiveness of the judgment which had been recorded. As far as the effect of the measures actually proposed was concerned, he was inclined to think that an effort to concentrate the attention of the committee upon the aggression in Korea might create the expectation in the United States that something should be done about Manchurian bases. He thought also that in the diplomatic field, a recommendation of the General Assembly might be of very considerable importance in preventing a change of representation in bodies which were nearly equally divided between recognizers and non-recognizers. In the Peace Observation Committee for example, which would have to be constituted before very long, the balance was equal. He thought, however, that there might be something to be said for the approach which I had suggested, particularly if it were made clear that the Additional Measures Committee was not limiting itself indefinitely to a consideration of the aggression in Korea alone, and that, if circumstances warranted, the application of measures over a wider field might be considered. I do not think, however, that the United States delegation will be prepared to accept the point of view I suggested without a good deal more persuasion.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. As you will have learned from our discussions when you were in Ottawa, we consider your suggestion that the Additional Measures Committee should concentrate on securing additional measures in Korea to be a fruitful approach. It is encouraging to learn that Jebb is interested in this idea and I hope that the British will support you. We consider this a sound policy and you should not hesitate therefore if you consider it opportune to take the initiative in putting forward this policy privately to friendly delegations and supporting it in the Committee.

2. In Paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 205 [of February 12] you have spoken of a switch of emphasis from sanctions against China to additional measures in Korea and this seems to us the proper approach. To argue that the Committee ought not to consider sanctions against China would be contrary to the intentions of those who proposed the Assembly Resolution and might well provoke a sharp conflict with the United States delegation and public opinion. To emphasize, however, that for the time being the most effective and appropriate means of opposing Chinese aggression would be by additional measures in Korea strikes a positive note which might have its appeal for the Americans. In doing so you could emphasize that this seems the best policy at the present time without raising the question as to whether sanctions against China itself might later be considered.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. As reported in my telegram No. 265 of March 1st, the United States delegation objected to procedure proposed by Bureau of Additional Measures Committee, according to which bureau would present to committee a report outlining all conceivable additional measures, and leave to a sub-committee the task of making a selection from amongst this extensive list for consideration by the committee. Sarper and Nisot, somewhat discouraged by heavy weather into which the bureau had unexpectedly run, turned over to Shann the task of negotiating with the Americans, British and French a report which would be mutually satisfactory. The report which has gone through two revisions is now ready for the committee and will be presented on Thursday next (8th March). As you will see, bureau has concurred in United States desire that a selected list be presented. List of possible additional measures as given in my immediately following teletype is therefore much more restrictive than in original proposal as given in my teletype No. 264 of February 28th.† On the other hand, United States and other delegations have concurred in proposal that a sub-committee, to consist of United States, United Kingdom, France, Australia, and the Philippines, be established for the purpose of considering priorities in the work of the committee.

2. I understand that though United Kingdom delegation has agreed to concur in the submission to the full committee of the list of possible additional measures contained in my immediately following teletype, no (repeat no) agreement has been reached between United Kingdom and French delegations on the one hand, and United States delegation on the other, as to action which should eventually be taken in regard to the measures to be proposed. In section II, for example, a list of diplomatic measures is given. As I understand, United Kingdom and United States still take diametrically opposite views in regard to these proposed measures, and present intention is eventually simply to put to a vote the question whether or not they shall be adopted.

3. If it continues to be your view that we should adopt policy as approved in your teletype No. 210 of March 2nd, I would suggest that I put a proposal in the terms we have been considering, to the committee when it meets on Thursday, and then suggest that the proposal, instead of being voted upon, be referred to the sub-committee for its consideration in determining how to proceed with the order of business suggested in the report of the bureau.

4. Report of bureau contained in my immediately following teletype has been given us by Australian delegation privately and it has not (repeat not) been given to all other members of the committee.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

Following is text of list of possible measures for consideration by the ad hoc Committee to be presented in the report of the bureau on Thursday next. First six paragraphs are preamble by the committee. Annex II to which reference is made in sixth paragraph was forwarded under my despatch No. 197 of March 1st,† text begins:

"In presenting the list attached as Annex I, the bureau wishes in no way to suggest that the measures contained therein may be appropriate. It may be that some of these lines of approach would be undesirable. If this were to be the case, the bureau would feel that it would be better for the committee to face this fact rather than to recommend action prematurely and without full consideration.

It should also be made clear that the mere fact that items are included in the list does not permit the inference that they are under active consideration by the committee as practical measures.

The question of how practical this or that avenue of approach may be raises matters concerned with the conduct of the committee's work. It would seem to the bureau unwise for the committee as a whole to take this list of possible measures as a kind of agenda. In the circumstances, it would be the recommendation of the bureau that the committee should appoint a sub-committee to consider what might be practical in this field and to report to the main committee, thereby greatly simplifying the work of the main committee and minimizing the possibility that it might be implied that the committee was considering a wide field of punitive action. The sub-committee should also consider priorities in the work of the committee.

Such a sub-committee might consist of five members of the committee, including some of the countries most closely involved.

This list does not include measures which have already been taken by the United Nations, or which are in process of being taken, under existing resolutions of the Security Council and the General Assembly, such as military, financial, economic and other relief assistance to victims of aggression, appeals to the parties, and so on.

For the information of the committee, a brief historical survey of the experience of the League of Nations in this field, which has been prepared by the secretariat at the request of the bureau, is attached as Annex II.

ANNEX II

List of Possible Questions for Consideration by the Committee

I. Should any of the following economic and financial measures be taken?

(1) Arms embargo;
(2) Trade restrictions;
(3) Restrictions on communications with the aggressor;
(4) Financial restrictions.

II. Diplomatic Measures

Should any of the following diplomatic measures be taken?

(1) Diplomatic representations, collective or otherwise;
(2) Withholding of recognition;
(3) Restriction of diplomatic relationships;
(4) Denial of representation in the United Nations;

(5) Non-recognition of the results of an aggression.

III. Should any of the following military measures be taken?

A. Additional measures in support of United Nations armed action in Korea:

(1) Provision of additional forces by member states already participating in the United Nations action in Korea;

(2) Broadening United Nations participation in the armed action in Korea, i.e., provision of armed forces by member states not currently participating in the United Nations action;

(3) Increasing and broadening support assistance (i.e. supplies, air and sea transport, medical aid etc.) of member states participating or who have not yet participated, in support of United Nations armed forces in Korea.

B. Other military action.

IV. Should further steps be taken to bring to the knowledge of the people of the world, especially the people of China and Korea, the nature of the United Nations action in Korea, and the aims and objectives of the United Nations there? Text ends.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. A closed meeting of this committee was held at 3 p.m. yesterday, 8th March, at which time the report of the bureau was submitted to the committee.

2. Before submitting the "list of possible questions for consideration" prepared by the bureau, the chairman (Sarper) dealt with the various organizational matters which had been referred to the bureau. These concerned (a) a title for the committee, (b) a request from the Republic of Korea to participate in the work of the committee, (c) liaison with the C[ommittee] G[ood] O[ffices] [sic].

3. So far as the title was concerned, the bureau recommended the name "Additional Measures Committee". This was agreed to by the committee without discussion. So far as (b) was concerned the bureau had drafted a letter to be sent to the Republic of Korea pointing out that the composition of the A.M.C. had been determined by a resolution of the Assembly and that, in any case, the Republic of Korea continued to have the opportunity to express its point of view in the Political Committee of the Assembly. This letter was agreed to with a modification to the effect that the A.M.C. might at some later stage decide to have a representative of Korea appear before the committee. So far as (c) was concerned, the chairman pointed out that he had understood from his discussions with the CGO that the latter had no definite information to report regarding "satisfactory progress" and that, in view of this, he had decided to call a meeting of the full A.M.C.

4. The chairman then presented the "list of possible questions for consideration", together with the two annexes, which I have already sent to you (my teletype No. 293 of 6 March and despatch No. 197 of 1 March†). In presenting his report Sarper emphasized that the bureau had not considered the substance of these possible measures or the question of priorities. He also stressed that the three members of the bureau were not bound, as individual representatives, by this list. Finally he suggested, on behalf of the bureau, that the sub-committee of five members should consist of Australia, France, Venezuela, the United Kingdom and the United States. This sub-committee would have the task of considering the practicability of the various measures suggested and also the question of priorities.

5. Without discussion the committee agreed to the idea of the sub-committee and to the composition suggested by the chairman.

6. LaCoste of France then made a short general statement emphasizing the importance his delegation attached to the preamble submitted by the bureau, and the need for careful scrutiny of the practicability of the various measures suggested.

7. I then spoke in the sense agreed to in our previous correspondence emphasizing the Canadian view that the committee should, in the first instance, consider the recommendation to the Assembly of direct additional measures in Korea itself, it being understood that such consideration would not prevent the committee from considering at a later stage additional measures of a "more general nature".

8. After I had spoken there was no discussion of the substance of our proposal. I then said that I was prepared to submit our proposal in a formal manner, if this was considered desirable, but that I did not think it was necessary to do so at the present stage. I suggested that the sub-committee might consider the proposal.

9. No other representatives spoke on the substance of the committee's work, and a somewhat confused discussion then took place regarding relations of the committee with the press. This was precipitated by a letter from the Acting President of the United Nations Correspondents Association addressed to the chairman of the committee, asking the committee to reconsider its decision to have the committee meet in closed session. This letter, the first of its kind in the United Nations, pointed out that three important committees of the United Nations were now meeting in closed session (the A.M.C., the C.M.C., and the C.G.O.) and in a careful and reasonable manner raised some important questions about the access which correspondents should have to United Nations proceedings. After discussion it was agreed that the chairman should orally inform the Acting President of the U.N.C.A. that the committee had considered this letter carefully, but that, in the present circumstances, the committee felt that it could proceed more usefully with its work in closed sessions. Discussion then took place regarding a communication to the press following the meeting of the committee.

10. I am sending you by bag an additional copy of the report of the bureau as submitted at yesterday's meeting.

For Wrong from Pearson, Begins: It looks to me as if once again we will be confronted, without warning, by a sudden change in American policy in Korea. You will recall that we have been requested, very sensibly, not to give the impression that any decision has been finally taken to cross or not to cross the 38th parallel. It would appear, however, from General Ridgway's statement that he or MacArthur or the Unified Command, or all three, have already taken such a decision.[28] As in the case of the St. Lawrence, we have been asked to co-operate in mystifying the opposition, with the only result that actions are taken by Washington which mystify us even more than the opposition. From here it is difficult to give any other interpretation to General Ridgway's statement than that indicated above, but possibly I may be wrong. Could you find out what, if anything, has happened. For one thing, if Ridgway is correct, and victory will be won when we get to the parallel, what is the point of sending the Canadian Brigade to Korea. It is certainly too good a Brigade for police duties alone. Have there been any developments in Peking in regard to the matter which you talked to me about when you were here, and on which the U.S. authorities seem to rely as a means for ending the Korean conflict.

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Your EX-542 of March 14th. General Ridway's statement of March 12th.

1. I am sure it would be inaccurate to regard Ridgway's references to the 38th parallel as indicating that a new decision has been taken that the parallel will not be crossed in any circumstances. The position remains that there will be prior consultation through the Ambassadors here of countries with forces in Korea before major operations above the parallel are undertaken, although offensive patrols and amphibious raids into North Korean territory may take place if operational conditions warrant.

2. I personally welcomed Ridgway's statement, except on the one point that he is quoted as saying "We set out to stop Communism" instead of "We set out to stop aggression in Korea". I think his main purpose was to make it clear that the war in Korea was worth fighting even if it ended with the re-establishment of the territorial situation which existed when it began. I take it that you agree with the view that the military objectives should be limited to the defeat of the aggression against the Republic of Korea and that the United Nations ought not to seek to impose by force the unification of the whole country. I reported as long ago as February 1st (my WA-397) that Rusk had told me that this position was being taken. He repeated it at a meeting of Ambassadors on February 16th (WA-622†), and it was set forth in the paper which he circulated at the meeting of Ambassadors on February 20th (WA-651†).

3. I think that Ridgway, with an eye to the spirit of his troops, had also in mind the administration of an antidote to the effects of MacArthur's grandiloquent statement of March 7th and particularly to his reference to the prospects of reaching "a point of theoretical military stalemate".[29] Would you agree that it was good stuff from this point of view?

4. The general expectation is that there will be another large Chinese offensive and that the recent Chinese withdrawals are an example of "reculer pour mieux sauter". It is likely that the reported evacuation of Seoul is not welcomed by the Field Command, as they would rather meet a new offensive on the Western flank with the Han River in front of them. The Chinese certainly have the capability of staging another offensive before long. I imagine that this expectation explains why

[29] Voir/See New York Times, March 8, 1951.

Ridgway described as "a purely hypothetical question" the establishment of military control up to the parallel. Unless the Chinese unexpectedly clear out of the Republic of Korea or are now ready to talk about a cease-fire, there will be a good deal more fighting, and on present prospects there is no ground for assuming that the Canadian brigade will have only police duties to perform in Korea.

5. I did not mean during our talks in Ottawa last month to leave you with the impression that it was thought here that certain developments in Peking might provide a way to end the Korean war. I think that it is rather the other way around — that the destruction of large Chinese forces in Korea might help to bring about developments in Peking through discrediting those responsible for the Korean venture.

6. Ridgway's statement and Rosenthal's despatch in yesterday's New York Times will be discussed at a meeting tomorrow at the State Department at 3:00 p.m. If there are any points which you would like me to make, I should be glad to hear of them in time for this meeting. Ends.

CEASE FIRE IN KOREA

As you will see by my statement in the House of Commons yesterday (a copy of which has been sent to you by bag) I think that it would be unreasonable to attempt to prevent the United Nations forces from maintaining contact with the enemy in Korea at least to the extent necessary to prevent a new Communist offensive being mounted without our knowledge. At the same time, I think that no major United Nations offensive should be planned or initiated. Instead, an attempt should now be made, taking advantage of the present de facto stabilization of the front to negotiate with Peking, aiming at a cease fire and eventually a settlement. When Sir Benegal Rau was in Ottawa last weekend there was an informal and frank discussion at dinner on Saturday night. Rau showed considerable interest in the suggestion that conditions might be propitious for an Indian attempt to induce Peking to enter into negotiations. An account† of this conversation will be sent to you by bag.

As I told you by telephone yesterday afternoon, my colleagues and I think that it would be wasteful if the small but well-trained striking force represented by the Canadian Special Brigade were sent to Korea merely to engage in some sort of police action. The United States authorities will probably succumb to the temptation to argue that as they have borne the brunt during the heavy fighting we should be willing to take over the police action and allow some of them to go home now.

This, however, is an emotional argument and one which does not consider the best use of the forces at the disposal of non-Communist powers. I should be grateful if you would make these views known to the United States authorities, at the same time making it clear that they are based on consideration of the general good rather than on a desire of the Canadian government to escape from its obligations.

1. Your EX-607 of March 22nd.† The changes in the proposed draft statement were given to Rusk yesterday morning but there has as yet been no discussion of them with the State Department. Mr. Acheson remarked to me on March 22nd that the statement should be issued just as soon as possible. He said that there had been considerable difficulty in securing agreement on its contents between the Defense and State Departments. As of this morning, however, the views of the United Kingdom Government have not been received at the British Embassy.

2. Your EX-598 of March 21st crossed my messages WA-1069† and 1070† about the draft statement. In view of your instructions to make known the views expressed in it to the United States authorities, I thought it well to incorporate the substance of your message, although not the exact language, in a letter to Mr. Rusk,† which I handed to him on the afternoon of March 22nd. He made little comment on the matters raised in paragraph 1 of EX-598 except to repeat that no major United Nations offensive was being planned or initiated. Both he and Mr. Acheson, however, told me of their concern at the thinness of the United Nations forces and the need, in order to preserve their security, of constantly keeping the enemy off balance in order to increase enemy difficulties in mounting a strong offensive; both mentioned in this connection the appearance in the present fighting of two Chinese armies from the Third Field Army which had not been in contact with the United Nations forces since last December.

3. With regard to the contents of the second paragraph of EX-598 concerning the Canadian brigade group, in Rusk's view it would be miraculous if the military situation were to be cleared up before the time of their departure for Korea sufficiently to make it evident that they will not be needed for combat service but only for police duties. He emphasized the urgent need for fresh troops in Korea and the almost total lack of reserves. I reminded him that the Canadian troops were offered only for combat service. He said that he was aware of this but no-one could say that they would not be needed for combat service unless a cease-fire were arranged before they reached Korea. Failing this, I think that we must accept it that the Unified Command will not be moved to notify us that the balance of the brigade group can be better employed elsewhere.

4. I am sending by the next bag copies of my letter to Rusk of March 22nd based on your EX-598. Incidentally, I was not able to speak to Sir Oliver Franks as suggested in paragraph 10 of your EX-607 since he will not arrive from London until the middle of next week.

15. M. Delisle. As a result of General MacArthur's statement of March 23, the United States Government has postponed its plan for governments contributing forces to Korea to issue a statement of United Nations objectives in Korea as a prelude to possible negotiations with Chinese Communists. In the meantime the United Kingdom has put forward another plan with the same purpose but consisting of two different statements, one to be issued jointly by governments with forces in Korea (along with India, Sweden and Denmark), and a second to be issued by President Truman as Chief Executive of the Unified Command.

16. In the United Kingdom plan the announcement would be followed by an approach to the Chinese and perhaps to the Soviet Governments drawing their attention to the joint declaration, expressing the desire for a peaceful settlement in Korea and requesting an expression of the views of the Chinese and Soviet Governments. The joint declaration would follow closely the Statement of Principles adopted by the Political Committee of the United Nations on January 13 and the lines of Mr. Pearson's subsequent suggestions for a six-point programme.

17. The preliminary comments of the State Department were on the whole favourable to the United Kingdom proposal. Mr. Rusk has suggested that the United Kingdom should prepare a draft of the joint declaration for consideration by the United States and other governments concerned and that the State Department would undertake to prepare a draft of a declaration which might be issued by the Unified Command.

18. While we favour the transmission of a joint declaration to the Chinese People's Government as soon as possible, we have suggested the following changes to the United Kingdom plan:

(a) the declaration should not be published before being sent to the Chinese People's Government;

(b) the United Nations should be brought in as soon as possible; the President of the General Assembly might be asked to transmit the declarations in confidence through the Indian Representative in Peking;

(c) we are not convinced of the wisdom of approaching the Soviet Government;

(d) careful consideration should be given to the question of the timing of the declaration. (SECRET)

19. The United States Secretary of Defence clarified the question of General MacArthur's authority to cross the 38th Parallel when he said on March 27 that the United Nations Commander would be guided by the necessity to safeguard the security of his command and although there were no geographical limits to an advance in North Korea so long as the security of his command was maintained, the question of a sweep across the Parallel was a matter for political consideration. The United Nations line presently extends across the peninsula roughly 4-8 miles south of the Parallel. (SECRET)

RE KOREA; GENERAL MACARTHUR'S PUBLIC STATEMENT

This is to record, briefly, what transpired on this subject at our conversation on Saturday morning with the U.S. Ambassador.

You said to Woodward that the Canadian Government had been very much disturbed by General MacArthur's open difference in essential policy with the stated objectives of the United Nations, in Korea. His letter to Representative Martin was in direct contradiction to the policy of the United Nations in which the U.S. Government had concurred.

Substantial numbers of Canadian troops were about to embark to join U.N. forces in Korea and this was an added reason for the Government's concern. You made it quite plain that we were opposed to any extension of the Korean hostilities, that in our view MacArthur's public attitude had set back materially the prospects of negotiated settlement; at the same time we recognized that the U.S. Administration did not share MacArthur's views.

You said that you would not wish the U.S. Government to be under any misapprehension as to the Canadian attitude and that our Ambassador in Washington had been instructed to inform U.S. authorities to this effect.

KOREA AND THE UNITED NATIONS

6. M. Delisle. A few days before General MacArthur's speech to Congress the United States Delegation at Lake Success suddenly pressed for a meeting of the sub-committee of the Additional Measures Committee with the declared purpose of having a proposal for economic measures against Communist China passed to a meeting of the full committee before MacArthur spoke to Congress. The United States move was designed to enable its representative in the full committee to urge an immediate active programme of economic sanctions for public consumption and thus counteract in advance part of the probable adverse effect of the MacArthur speech. At the same time the United States representative pressed for a report to the First Committee of the General Assembly which should meet as soon as delegations had an opportunity to receive instructions.

7. Because of strong British, French and Australian objections in the sub-committee the United States move was modified to a recommendation that the Additional Measures Committee give first priority to a consideration of economic measures against China but with no agreement as to when the full committee should meet. In view of the strong United States pressure it is probable the meeting will take place no later than the week of April 23, although there is a strong desire for indefinite postponement because of the belief that a recommendation on this subject at the present stage is premature and likely to jeopardize possible negotiations.

8. Our Ambassador in Washington has obtained from the State Department a different explanation of this move for action in the Additional Measures Committee. It is reported that the objectives are much more limited then those reported from New York and that there is no thought of convoking a meeting of the Political Committee. No advice on substance or timing is being given Mr. Holmes until United States policy clarifies enough for us to know what is behind the move.

Your EX-871 of April 20th† and Permdel's 407 of April 24th† (repeated Washington 299). Additional Measures Committee.

1. We have now had an opportunity to obtain some clarification of State Department thinking about the work of the Additional Measures Committee from the State Department and from the British Embassy. From our consultations here we judge that the apparent difference between the attitude of the United States delegation in New York and the State Department in Washington derives from a difference in emphasis and the zeal with which the United States delegation apparently has sought to push State Department views on this question.

2. As Holmes has reported to you in his No. 407, Franks saw Hickerson over the weekend at Hickerson's request. A similar approach was made to the Australian and French Ambassadors. These representatives were chosen because of their countries' memberships on the sub-committee of the A.M.C. Venezuela had apparently already agreed to the United States proposals.

3. In his talks with Franks, Hickerson expressed the hope that the United Kingdom Government would not continue to insist that the Additional Measures Committee should withhold its report until the Good Offices Committee had submitted a report on the progress of their negotiations. He said that in the opinion of the State Department the Additional Measures Committee should meet at the latest by the end of this month and should take up the proposal to impose a limited selective economic embargo against Communist China. His remarks to Franks were an appeal for co-operation and not in the form of a demand. Hickerson referred to the state of public opinion in this country and admitted that the move to some extent was determined by public pressure applied to the Administration in consequence of the events connected with the dismissal of General MacArthur. Hickerson recalled however that the State Department had not been happy about the delay which had occurred in the implementation of the resolution setting up the Additional Measures Committee since February 1st, and said that it was now more difficult to justify further delay.

4. The points made by Hickerson in support of the United States position may be summarized as follows:

(a) The adoption by the United Nations of a resolution to impose limited selective economic embargoes would provide those countries which had assumed the major responsibilities for resisting aggression in Korea with a recommendation by the United Nations which may be used to bring the more "reluctant" countries into line with the policy of denying essential military supplies to the aggressors. (He pointed out that the parties to the Consultative Committee in Paris were actually doing more than was now proposed but these arrangements could not be cited in public).

(b) The tangible effects of a limited economic embargo might:

(i) Increase unrest in Communist China because of resulting unemployment;

(ii) Increase difficulties in industrial production;

(iii) Make the public in China more conscious of the consequences of their government's policy in Korea due to an increased lack of essential consumer supplies such as cotton. (Hickerson particularly referred to Pakistan continuing to supply China with cotton at a time when the pinch was already felt in China as a result of the United States embargo).

(c) The effects of the limited embargo would not, in the judgment of the State Department, seriously interfere with the work of the Good Offices Committee but might on the contrary make the Chinese more disposed to seek a peaceful settlement in Korea. (He noted that the Chinese could not have shown less disposition to negotiate under the policy of inaction on the part of the A.M.C.);

(d) The main purpose of the United States proposals was their psychological effect not only in China, but also upon those countries that had so far not made any substantial contributions to the support of the United Nations in Korea and had continued normal trading with China.

5. As to the time of the meeting, Hickerson said that the State Department fully realize there was little use in calling a meeting of the Additional Measures Committee unless the United States could count on the support of the major Powers for its minimum programme. They have urged that the Committee should meet if possible by April 30th, and Franks has consulted London with regard to the "appeal" made to him by Hickerson.

6. In the course of our weekly meeting with Raynor, substantially the same points were made as reported above. Raynor added that now that the Communist Chinese have opened a full offensive in Korea, it was even more difficult to accept the view that the prospects of negotiating a peaceful settlement could be harmed by further postponement of action by the Additional Measures Committee; it was the State Department view that the United Nations resistance in the field should be supported by such hindrance of the military plans of the Communists as would result from the application of a selective economic embargo.

7. I have refrained so far from being drawn into these discussions, since I have not been approached by Hickerson. I have, however, made it clear to the State Department that we share the anxiety expressed by the United Kingdom and Australia on this subject and believe that we should avoid airing our differences on Far Eastern policy in public at a time when emotion in this country is running high.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. Bolte of the United States mission called on the delegation yesterday to outline the State Department thinking on the work of the Additional Measures Committee and to ask our views. He explained the American anxiety to press on with the work of the A.M.C. The Good Offices Committee he indicated could carry on parallel existence, but in the United States view the A.M.C. did not have to wait until the G.O.C. had concluded its activities. The American view was that proceeding with additional measures was the best way to encourage the Chinese to cease their aggression or to negotiate. When I asked if they had any concrete plans for a meeting of the First Committee, he implied that there was nothing definite, but that they did envisage a report from the A.M.C. to the Assembly as soon as possible. I said that I had no specific instructions on this subject, but I thought that we would be very much concerned over the possibility of a repetition in any form of the rancourous debates which took place last January. If pressing on with additional measures would serve only to expose divisions among the democratic countries, then I wondered if it was worth while. I said that I thought an important factor in deciding our position would be whether or not the enforcement of the proposed selective embargo would in fact tighten the controls which were now in existence. In pressing for action, was his government primarily concerned with the moral effect of a United Nations decision, or the concrete harm which would be done to Chinese war production by measures which could be taken? Bolte had no information to offer about the effects of the embargo, and I got the impression that this not unimportant aspect of the matter was one on which the Americans had not been concentrating. He did not say that it was the moral aspect they were interested in, but he did talk about the great effect of overwhelming support for economic sanctions by the members of the United Nations. When we pressed him, however, he admitted that there was very little chance of the Asian countries, except the Philippines and Thailand, agreeing to the proposal and that there was considerable doubt of support by the Middle Eastern States.

2. Bolte did indicate that the Americans were anxious not to have a public display of disunity. It was for that reason, he said, that they were sounding out other delegations in advance. He did not say that if the reaction of friendly delegations was unfavourable, State Department would alter its course.

3. If you consider that it is important to avoid a public display of difference, it would, I think, be a useful time to express such views to the State Department. It would be helpful also if we could find out whether the proposed embargo would in fact increase the pressure on Chinese war production, bearing in mind the fact that countries such as India would probably not join us.

4. A week or so ago the Australians showed me a report of discussions they had had with the Foreign Office in London on this issue, in which someone in the Foreign Office had indicated that the British view of the application of additional measures would change if the Chinese launched a new offensive. If this were the case, then the situation with regard to the American program for the A.M.C. might be considerably altered. We should then presumably not have to worry about a display of disunity among the major participating powers, although presumably differences with India and her Asian associates would still exist.

ACTION IN ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. Reference your WA-1718 of April 25, WA-1728 of April 26†, and C.P.D.U.N. messages 410† and 411 repeated to you as 303 and 305 of April 26.

2. We are most grateful for the action you have taken as outlined in para. 7 of your WA-1718. While we are sympathetic towards the needs of the United States Administration in present circumstances and do not wish to embarrass it in any way in coping with General MacArthur and his followers, the proposals made by Hickerson present several difficulties. They appear to be based on the proposition that cutting off trade with China will in some way create serious difficulties in that country. Our assessment is that China will not be materially affected because it has learned largely to get along without trade with the West and because it can fill some of its more important needs in any case by trade with the Soviet bloc. As Hickerson is aware, the parties to the Consultative Committee in Paris are actually doing more than would be proposed by the measures the United States wishes the Additional Measures Committee to adopt. I think the fact that economic difficulties have not already caused the Central People's Government trouble such as that outlined in paragraph 4 of WA-1718 is in itself a demonstration of the accuracy of our assessment.

3. Furthermore, Hickerson's assessment of the effects of an economic blockade is based on the fundamental miscalculation that we shall be able to sell our point of view to the people of China but that the Chinese Government will not be able to sell theirs. Instead of the Chinese people blaming their Communist government for unemployment and the policy being pursued in Korea, they are far more likely to believe government propaganda which will blame the United States and its allies for any harmful effects which may result.

4. It is hard to see how Hickerson's proposals will lead to any increased economic pressure on China even if one concedes that economic pressure is possible. The United States is going to have considerable difficulty in gathering sufficient support for its policy (see the last sentence of No. 411 from New York to Ottawa). It would seem probable that the states which did not agree with United States policy would, if that policy is adopted by the Additional Measures Committee, refuse to consider themselves bound by it. Therefore, no additional trade is likely to be cut off. In addition the internal argument used by Hickerson does not appear very convincing. He states that the measures which are proposed to be adopted by the Additional Measures Committee are less severe than the measures already being applied by the Consultative Committee in Paris yet he seems to expect that a public declaration of intention to take measures which are not as effective as measures actually in effect will in some way have greater results than the restrictions being applied by the countries party to the Consultative Committee.

5. I should think that the two outstanding effects of the United States proposal would be to create public dissension among the non-Communist states in the United Nations and to widen the misunderstanding which already exists between the United States and India.

6. Paragraph 4 of No. 411 from New York to Ottawa suggests that the position of the United Kingdom may have been changed by the launching of the new Chinese offensive. We should like to have clarification on this point before we make up our minds definitely on what our position will be on the United States proposal.

Your telegram No. 721 of April 27. Action in Additional Measures Committee.

The present position taken by the Foreign Secretary was set out in a telegram of April 26 to Sir Oliver Franks who will, no doubt, have spoken by now to the State Department. We read the text of the message at the China and Korea Department of the Foreign Office this morning, April 28, shortly after receiving your telegram under reference. The following sub-paragraphs contain the substance of the Foreign Office telegram to Franks:

(a) The Foreign Secretary approved the line taken by Franks with Hickerson (apparently the views stated by Hickerson were similar to those reported to you by Mr. Wrong from Washington);

(b) The United Kingdom seemed to be reaching a stalemate with the United States over future policy concerning Korea. The United Kingdom and other countries wanted an early declaration of aims in order to rally world opinion and to supplement the work of the Good Offices Committee. The Foreign Office had refrained from pressing the State Department during the past week in view of the present political atmosphere in the United States. The State Department were saying that they had delayed the pace of the Additional Measures Committee since February out of deference to other governments' views;

(c) But in the absence of a reaffirmation of aims the Foreign Secretary doubted whether the United Nations would be in a strong position to convince Chinese or world opinion generally of their peaceful intentions and of their steadfast purpose to continue resisting if no settlement could be reached. There was a danger of drift and some set purpose was needed. The Foreign Secretary hoped that he would receive soon Mr. Acheson's comments on the joint draft declaration. (We understand that the Foreign Office have as yet received no official United States comment but that they are expecting Mr. Acheson to send a letter on this subject and possibly on other Far Eastern issues to Mr. Morrison.)

(d) Meanwhile the Foreign Secretary agreed that he could not object to the convening of the Additional Measures Committee on April 30 since the Good Offices Committee was making no progress and the pressures on the United States Government were strong. Nevertheless he is not enthusiastic and would object strongly to the Additional Measures Committee rushing ahead and submitting a report at once to the Political Committee of the General Assembly. He hopes that the Additional Measures Committee will spend some time in occasional meetings and that before the committee becomes ready to consider its report, there will be another opportunity to consult further with Washington along present lines in the light of the prevailing situation. By that time it may have been found that:

(i) A final decision on a declaration of aims has become feasible;

(ii) The nature of the Chinese offensive will have become more clear;

(iii) The present pressure on the United States Government may have lifted.

(e) If, moreover, the Chinese offensive is blunted, Peking may be more chastened and it would, therefore, be highly inopportune for the United Nations to embark at that stage on economic sanctions. Economic sanctions might:

(i) Rule out any chance of negotiations;

(ii) Cause embarrassment;

(iii) Make the Foreign Secretary's own position more difficult;

(iv) Stimulate anti-American feeling in the United Kingdom.

(f) As regards Hickerson's belief that economic sanctions might bring the Peking authorities more to heel, Franks was referred to a recent message from Lamb in Peking and authorized to make use of it at his discretion. (We also read Lamb's message, the essence of which was that the present position of the Peking Government continued to be strong in spite of any slight loss of prestige with the Chinese people owing to the military situation in Korea. Lamb doubted very much whether Hickerson's arguments were good and the Foreign Office quite obviously shared his views.)

2. Krishna Menon called at the Foreign Office on April 27. He indicated that in the Indian view the present was not a propitious moment to make the proposed declaration of aims although the initiative in this matter lay chiefly with the United Kingdom. He said that the Peking authorities had not been persuaded by the removal of General MacArthur to alter their views on United States policy in the Far East.

Your EX-931 of April 27th, Additional Measures Committee.

1. When seeing Hickerson today on another matter, I mentioned the difficulties which we thought might follow from pressure by the United States for the early imposition of a selective economic embargo. He agreed that the economic effect in China was likely to be slight, although some in the State Department considered that the movement of strategic materials to China would be further restricted. He argued, however, for the imposition of the embargo on other grounds, to which he attached substantial importance.

2. First, he said that it was necessary in order to convince the Chinese Communist that the United Nations was not "weak, irresolute and disunited" in its resistance to aggression in Korea, nor afraid to undertake what was a logical and safe action — safe in that it would involve no risk of extending the Korean war. The present embargoes were secret, and to obtain this result it was necessary to come out into the open. It would show the Communists that the United Nations meant business in Korea. Of course the main method of demonstrating this was to carry on a successful campaign in Korea itself, but a selective embargo imposed by the United Nations nevertheless had, in his view, a subsidiary value. Since the principal suppliers of strategic materials were in fact imposing an embargo, why not let the Chinese know that this was being done and place it under the authority of the United Nations?

3. Hickerson's second main argument was that this was the best way to silence the unfair charges against the British, French and other governments that they were allowing munitions of war to go to China. Attacks of this nature are being made daily in the United States and not only from irresponsible sources. From the point of view of public relations, it was most important to bring into the open the actual and effective co-operation between the governments mainly concerned. It would help the administration in dealing with the opposition centering around MacArthur, and it would help to restore the damaged prestige of the United Nations both in the United States and, he thought, in some other countries as well.

4. Although Hickerson admitted that there might be some public disagreements among the allies, he did not appear to regard this as of much importance. He remarked that when it came to the point of an actual vote in the Political Committee or the Assembly, it would be difficult even for India to oppose the modest selective embargo which the United States was urging. I observed that a reluctant affirmative vote wrung from India by United States pressure might damage relations with the United States worse than a negative vote or an abstention, and he admitted that this was possible.

5. The case as put by Hickerson rests on the intangible effects of an official embargo, and it is therefore not easy to controvert.

FOURTEEN-POWER DECLARATION

1. I have been giving further thought to the possibility of reviving action on the Fourteen-Power Declaration on Korea originally proposed by the United Kingdom. I realize that the height of the Communist offensive is no time to make a declaration, but as you have commented, it will take a considerable time before agreement can be reached between fourteen governments on a move of this sort so it seems to me that it is not too early to start trying now to achieve an agreed text for a declaration which could be ready by the time the Communist offensive has been repelled and before the United States is riding the high tide of a counter-offensive.

2. I feel that an agreed declaration should not constitute a retreat from the Five Principles of January 13, although I recognize that conditions in the United States may make it necessary to have arrangements for a settlement in Korea almost complete before other Far Eastern questions can be discussed.

3. Would you therefore please discuss the matter with Sir Oliver Franks to see where the matter stands between him and the State Department and, if you consider it advisable, tell the State Department that we think it is now time to start the process of trying to get agreement on a text of a joint declaration, especially as the domestic controversy over the Far East is not quite as excitable as it was 10 days ago.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. There seems to be general agreement among the British, French, Belgians, and Australians with whom I have discussed the policy to be adopted in the Additional Measures Committee that we should endeavour to put off decisions and avoid a public display of disunity for the time being at least. The United States would undoubtedly have the support of Venezuela, the Philippines, Turkey, and probably Brazil. The Mexican representative has adopted a neutral position, and it is quite possible that Padilla Nervo, because of his position on the G.O.C. would not support the United States move. Egypt will do whatever seems opportune to Fawzi but is hardly likely to support an embargo. There may be shifts in these positions, but there is very little chance of the United States securing a majority for an unequivocal recommendation to the First Committee. Divergence of opinion is certain. One can also be sure that any differences which are expressed in the Committee will be made known in the press.

2. Under these circumstances it seems desirable to put off as long as possible not merely a decision by the Additional Measures Committee, but discussion in the Committee. As the United States is expected to put forward a new proposal at Thursday's meeting, we should be able to adjourn the meeting in order to consider this proposal. If this tactic seems achievable, I think we ought not to make a statement unless it is to support a deferment of consideration.

3. The other delegations principally concerned have not yet had instructions or made up their minds definitely about the tactics for Thursday. The Australians had been told ten days ago that if there was a meeting of the A.M.C., they should indicate that although they did not necessarily disagree with the substance of the United States proposal, they did disagree with the timing. They were instructed on these grounds to vote against the American proposal if it came to a decision. Yesterday, however, they received a further telegram indicating that their new minister is being consulted, and that new, although not necessarily different, instructions will be sent. Nisot of the Belgian delegation strongly shares the view that it would be better to adjourn the meeting on Thursday as soon as possible without any statements on the substance, and he has no intention of speaking himself. The British and French are completely agreed on the necessity of preventing a report going from the A.M.C. to the Assembly, but they are not yet agreed on the method. While the British think it would be best for the A.M.C. to take the United States proposals under consideration and endeavour to postpone any decision, the French would prefer to refer the proposals to the sub-committee previously established on the grounds that there are a good many legal and technical problems arising out of the proposals which must be considered. I am inclined to think that the French suggestion might have more chance of success. The Americans are not likely to be attracted by the idea of another sub-committee stage, but this would at least give some impression of movement. In view of what the Americans have been saying to us, I doubt if they would allow us to go on considering their proposals indefinitely without holding a further meeting of the A.M.C. The French and British will be meeting with the Americans before Thursday's meeting and will try to reach some agreement.

4. Yesterday I had a long talk with Lacoste and Tine of the French delegation on this whole question, from which it became quite evident that their views and ours are very close together. They think the United States has nothing to gain from provoking differences in the A.M.C., and they are convinced after serious, and I gather somewhat technical, discussions in Washington that the proposed selective embargo would have no effect at all on the Chinese war effort. The French delegation is aware of the fact that there are difficulties in the way of making public what the North Atlantic countries are doing in the way of restricting war materials, but they have asked their government to reconsider the question in view of the decided advantages at the present time of being in a position to assure the American public that France and its associates are not supplying China with unlimited quantities of products to support their war effort. Lacoste told me that both he and Bonnet in Washington had pleaded with the Americans not to press ahead and had warned them that they would not get a majority in the Assembly. The response of the United States mission to this warning was to point out that the French and British had said the same thing in January but when it came to the test, the United States had got the majority it wanted.

Your telegram 421 of May 1. Additional Measures Committee.

1. We agree with the position you have taken in paragraph 2 that rather than opposing the United States proposal at this stage we should resort to deferment in the hope that the pressure on the United States Government for some public action of the nature proposed may be relieved by other means.

2. It seems to us, for example, that the United States position might be made easier if the Governments which are already imposing restrictions on trade with China could be brought to reveal the existence of these restrictions. The governments need not relate the steps they have taken to the existence of the Consultative Committee in Paris if revelation of such relationship appears unwise. One method by which the secrecy of the relationship could be maintained would be to have the Additional Measures Committee ask all the members of the United Nations what steps they are now taking to restrict the flow of war materials to China. The countries members of the Consultative Committee would then be free to state what steps they are taking without mentioning the existence of the Consultative Committee. Otherwise it would be difficult to avoid the appearance of concerted action if the countries which are members of the Consultative Committee suddenly and voluntarily announced the existence of almost identical restrictions. (Sweden and Switzerland are not members but are merely associated with it.)

3. Please try to consult before the meeting this afternoon with other friendly delegations on this suggestion. It might be that one of the members of the Sub-Committee of the Additional Measures Committee such as France, the United Kingdom or Australia might wish to put it forward formally. It seems to me that the chief merit of our suggestion is that a strong argument could be made that, before the Additional Measures Committee considers recommending additional measures against China, it should first find out what measures are now being taken in the field of selective economic embargoes by the member states of the United Nations.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. A following telegram will contain a report of yesterday's meeting of the Additional Measures Committee.

2. I have discussed the suggestion of a general enquiry of all members about the economic measures which they are taking against China with the United Kingdom, the United States, the French, and Australian delegations. It was clear before the meeting that although the British, French, and Australians listened with interest to the suggestion, none of them wished to put it forward yesterday without consulting their governments. The British and French indicated that they would not want to propose such an enquiry until they were certain that their governments would not be embarrassed by it. LaCoste, who was anxious to refer the United States proposal to the sub-committee for study, thought that our proposal might be considered at the sub-committee stage. Neither the British nor the French, however, were particularly receptive to the suggestion, primarily, I think, because they have accepted a defeatist attitude. Coulson told me before the meeting that he saw no hope at all of stalling the Americans by any device and said they had concluded that there was nothing to be done but to meet the Americans frontally in the committee with a statement of their objections. LaCoste is convinced that nothing will deter the Americans and that we are certain to be faced with their proposal in the Assembly within a fortnight.

3. The Americans did not reject our proposal out of hand and said they would look into it. They are, however, determined to press forward with their resolution at the earliest possible moment and indicated that they were not likely to accept any action which would involve delay. Ross expressed doubts as to the value of the results of such a survey on the grounds that the authorities in Washington knew what every country was doing and was already in a position to assess the results. He did, however, to some extent accept the argument that it was one thing for the United States and a few of her close allies to have this confidential information on record, and another thing for certain basic information to be in the hands of all members of the United Nations so that they might consider the question of economic measures in the proper perspective. I doubt, however, if there is any hope of deterring the Americans from pressing forward with their programme, unless they are given firm reason to believe that they cannot get a majority in the A.M.C.

When I talked to Gross after the meeting, I found him pretty confident of the results. He said candidly that the British were the key country. He thought that they would eventually give in and then the opposition from Western European and Commonwealth countries would collapse. He may have some reasons for this expectation. Although the United Kingdom delegation is still expressing categorical objections, Jebb is in an uneasy position, because he is by no means certain that Morrison will not change his instructions at a later stage. It was for this reason that his statement in the committee yesterday was very cautiously worded and gave the impression of more agreement with the Americans than the substance of his statement warranted.

4. When I talked to Gross he emphasized that what the Americans were now asking was the very least they could urge in view of the strong pressures for much more vigorous action. He said that he would have liked to make this fact clear in his statement, but did not wish to do so lest it be considered a veiled threat. He did, however, indicate to me that if we did not accept this proposal, undoubtedly we would be faced sooner or later with much less acceptable recommendations from the Americans.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. In this message I am giving a factual report on the closed meeting of the AMC held at 3 p.m. yesterday, 3 May. In a separate message† I am reporting on several private conversations I had before and after the meeting.

2. LaCoste, who is chairman of the sub-committee, submitted their report which merely contained a recommendation that the AMC give priority to the study of economic measures. Gross, who spoke first, said that the United States delegation had come to the conclusion that economic measures were those most likely to command widespread support within the United Nations and for this reason the United States supported the sub-committee's recommendation. He then described what the United States had done in banning exports to Communist China and in freezing assets of the Communist Chinese in the United States. He then referred to the fact that certain other governments such as the Philippines, Australia and the United Kingdom also imposed a strategic embargo (to a greater or lesser extent) against Communist China. He said that the United States considered that the objective of a full economic embargo should be kept in mind by the United Nations but that the effectiveness of an embargo depended on its securing widespread support; the United States believed that it would be more effective if "most of us" were to agree to a strategic embargo "rather than having a smaller number of us agree to a complete embargo". Gross then outlined the ingredients of a recommendation which, in the opinion of the United States delegation, the AMC should make back to the General Assembly for a selective economic embargo. He said, "we have in mind a formula which would call for the embargo of shipments to Communist China of arms, ammunition and implements of war; petroleum; atomic energy materials; and items useful in the production of arms, ammunition and implements of war". Each state should determine for itself what specific commodities it would embargo under this formula, and what controls it would apply to make the embargo effective. The resolution of the AMC should call on every state not to "nullify", through transshipment or re-export, the effectiveness of the embargoes imposed by complying states. Finally, such a resolution of the AMC should call for the establishment of machinery for keeping this programme of selective embargoes under continuous review and for determining the effectiveness of the economic measures being taken. This would require the establishment of a committee — possibly the AMC itself — to which all states would report regarding the measures they had taken, and which would make recommendations back to the Assembly.

3. Gross stressed that, in his government's view, it was now time to "record the actions some United Nations members have already taken and to widen, through cooperation, the scope of such measures". He said that, in essence, the United States programme amounted to "recording the determination that no United Nations soldier fighting in Korea should be the target of a bullet manufactured in the free world". He also stressed again the United States view that the imposition of economic measures on the recommendation of the AMC would not hamper the work of the Good Offices Committee but might assist the GOC by bringing pressure on Peking to negotiate a peaceful settlement. He said, as other United States spokesmen had frequently said before, that the work of the AMC and the GOC were complementary, not contradictory.

4. Gross's statement was somewhat more moderate than might have been expected. He did everything possible to minimize differences and went out of his way to emphasize the action being taken by other countries to restrict exports to China.

5. Jebb then made a generally cautious and moderate statement, in which he started off by concurring with the recommendation of the sub-committee to give priority to the consideration of economic measures, and also by agreeing generally with the five headings suggested by Gross, if the AMC decided that now was the proper time to proceed with a recommendation for economic measures. He said the United Kingdom already had in existence a system of control of strategic exports to Communist China which more than amounted to compliance with the programme suggested by Gross. However, Jebb said that the actual effect of such a recommendation by the AMC, and by the General Assembly, might be very slight, as it was not likely to diminish materially trade with China, in view of the fact that the major states were already adopting such a system of selective embargoes. The psychological effect on Peking of such a resolution was at least "arguable" and, instead of inducing them to negotiate, as Gross had suggested, such a resolution might increase their recalcitrance. The AMC should carefully study this aspect of the question. Jebb also said that, if such a resolution were to be effective, it must command a wide majority in the General Assembly, and that, if divisions over this resolution were revealed in the AMC, these divisions would be considerably multiplied in the public debates in the Assembly. The United Kingdom was most anxious to avoid a further acrimonious debate on this matter in the Assembly. In conclusion, the United Kingdom believed that the programme outlined by Gross should be carefully considered by the AMC in the light of all these factors and that considerable time might be required to arrive at a judgment as to whether the United States proposals should be proceeded with at the present time.

6. LaCoste spoke in a generally similar manner to Jebb. He said that the French Government already had a system of strategic embargoes against Communist China which went further than the programme suggested by Gross. Nevertheless, France wanted to consider very carefully the implications of the United States proposal which involved a number of highly "technical" aspects.

7. Shann of Australia spoke much more strongly than either Jebb or LaCoste regarding the undesirability of a public debate in the Assembly and on the question of timing. Australia did not share Gross's views regarding the psychological effects of his proposal on the Peking Government, and they were not convinced that a public discussion of this matter in the Assembly "was in the best interests of the United Nations". He thought that, in view of recent developments, it would be well to postpone a resolution of this nature until the prospects for a peaceful negotiation were more clear. He said Australia was already doing more than the United States programme called for in the way of embargoes, but that they disagreed with the United States delegation regarding the timing of this proposal. Nor was Australia convinced that the adoption of this resolution would have much effect on China, as the embargoes it called for were already being applied by nearly all the major countries. Therefore, what the AMC must consider was whether the "dubious effects" of such a resolution on restricting trade with China were sufficient to offset the dangers of an acrimonious public debate which would inevitably reveal sharp disunity between the major democracies.

8. The representatives of Brazil, Turkey, Venezuela and the Philippines all spoke in support of the United States proposals; and Sarper of Turkey described the proposal as the "bare minimum" which the AMC could respectably adopt.

9. Nisot of Belgium, without committing himself either way to the substance of the United States proposal, urged the necessity of considering its implications very carefully. As it appeared as if all other members of the committee would be expressing views and putting themselves on the record as restricting exports to China, I spoke very briefly in the same sense as Nisot. I said that we were already applying controls over strategic materials to China. As for the United States proposal, I thought there should be due opportunity to consider all its implications. I added that we also wished to consider the "tactical" arguments which had been advanced by Jebb and Shann.

10. Some discussion then took place concerning the question of referring the United States proposal to the existing sub-committee for further study. Gross pointed out that his delegation had not yet submitted a resolution and that, while he expected to do this sometime next week, there was nothing so far which the sub-committee could consider. Moreover he disagreed with LaCoste, who had made the suggestion of reference to the sub-committee, on the grounds that the United States resolution was not really of a technical nature and that it could be perfectly well examined in the full committee. Sarper of Turkey also supported this view. LaCoste did not press for reference of this matter to the sub-committee at the present stage, but made clear that he had merely postponed his proposal until the United States submitted a formal resolution. He then repeated his arguments that, in view of the technical considerations involved, this matter should first of all be considered in a smaller body than the AMC.

11. When the United States formally table their resolution, probably at the next meeting of the AMC, a sharp debate will probably take place on whether or not it should be referred to the sub-committee. The United States will undoubtedly resist this course. I would appreciate your instructions as to what position I should take on this point.

12. Before the meeting adjourned the committee formally approved the sub-committee's recommendations that priority be given to considering economic measures. There were no negative votes, but Egypt and Mexico did not participate in the voting. The Mexican representative explained that he had no instructions on this point (Padilla Nervo was not present), while Fawzi Bey of Egypt said he was not "participating" because he would have wished more time to consider this point.

13. In answer to a question from the chairman, Fawzi declined to give any real information regarding progress by the twelve Asian-Arab countries in their efforts to find a basis for negotiation with Peking. He confined himself to saying that they were maintaining contact with Peking through the Indian Ambassador there. He did, however, say that he would speak to Rau and report at the next meeting of the AMC on the latest information received from Panikkar.

14. The next meeting of the AMC will take place on Monday, 7 May, at 3 p.m. At that time it is probable that the United States will formally submit their proposals as a resolution, but Gross would not give any definite assurance that his delegation would be ready to submit a resolution by that date.

UNITED STATES POLICY IN KOREA

1. Hickerson told me today that Mr. Acheson sent a personal message to Mr. Morrison on April 30th restating the views of the United States Government on the Korean situation.[30] He said that he and Merchant prepared a draft last week at Acheson's request. Acheson had re-written it in his own language over the week-end, adding an appeal for a moratorium on the issue of Chinese representation in the United Nations. The message is therefore a fresh and important statement of policy written in the light of the turmoil caused by MacArthur's removal from command.

2. Yesterday evening Ignatieff was shown the text of this message at the British Embassy under a promise that we would not reveal to the State Department that we had seen it. Ignatieff was able to make notes, and he has given me the following full summary:

Summary begins:

(I) General Approach

The message starts by saying that the United States and United Kingdom are on common ground in their approach to Far Eastern problems, in desiring peace and security in the Pacific and the earliest conclusion of the Korean conflict. The problem is how to achieve these agreed aims in Korea.

(II) Ending the War in Korea

Mr. Acheson said that "short of a change in the aggressive Communist purposes, I do not see how hostilities can cease". After pointing out that there had been no indication of any change of purpose by Communist China, he went on to say that there was no alternative but to continue the fight and that "our economic and political measures and attitudes must back up our military ones". The objective should be to demonstrate to Communist China that a cessation of hostilities would be in their interest. It was also essential to make plain in every "sensible way" that allied military objectives in Korea are limited and that we agree that fighting should cease "when aggression stops".

(III) Air Counter-attack

[30] Voir/See United States, Department of State, FRUS, 1951, Volume VII, Washington: Government Printing Office, 1983, p. 390-394.

On this point Mr. Acheson's message recited the line which has been given to us by Hickerson and Merchant, but had this significant clarification of what Mr. Acheson means when he says that "the decision must be made in Washington". His message says that the particular circumstances of an aerial attack cannot be anticipated. "For these reasons we believe that this government, as unified command, must retain latitude to determine whether an attack requires counter-action in order to preserve the safety of the forces. This requires confidence on the part of our allies that the decision will be soberly and wisely made". In explaining this position, Mr. Acheson said "the authority to take counter-action to preserve the command is inherent in, and essential to, the very concept of a command".

(IV) Selective Economic Embargoes

On this point Mr. Acheson's message covered familiar ground. He recalled that the proposal now to impose selective economic embargoes against China arose from the decision taken last January by the United Nations. It had then been agreed by the United States that action by the additional Measures Committee would be deferred so long as the Good Offices Committee was able to report satisfactory progress. Almost three months have passed and the Good Offices Committee "cannot even report progress". It had been argued, the message said, that the imposition of economic sanctions might further alienate the Chinese Communists and make it more difficult to re-align China with the free world. Mr. Acheson's answer to this was that only the ending of the aggression in Korea would make it possible to bring China into re-alignment with the free world, that the addition of economic embargoes was calculated to encourage China to decide to end the aggression, and that failure to take this decision would only encourage continued aggression. Mr. Acheson also recalled that the United States had ended all commercial and financial arrangements with China. Instead of pressing other nations to go as far as this, the United States was only asking them to proclaim publicly what was already in effect being done secretly.

(V) Admission of Communist Chinese Representatives to the United Nations

After recalling differences between the two governments on this question in the past, Mr. Acheson had this to say — "whatever may have been the merits of the debate, can we not now agree to a moratorium upon it?". In support of this position, Mr. Acheson argued that, at a time when the Chinese Communist forces were fighting United Nations forces, the discussion of the admission of representatives of Communist China to the United Nations only tended to divide the allies and to encourage the aggressors. He also said that the public in the United States just could not understand how anybody should consider "admitting the enemy to the organization which they are fighting".

(VI) Public Declaration

Mr. Acheson recalled that the two governments had given "careful thought to the possibility suggested last month of having a new declaration of aims which would re-emphasize our desire for a peaceful settlement upon the conclusion of aggression". He would be glad to have further talks with officers of the British Embassy on this question but noted that the State Department had already expressed serious objections to certain "elements of the United Kingdom draft". As to the timing of the declaration, Mr. Acheson expressed the view that at the present moment (i.e. at the beginning of this week) it was not opportune when the military issue was still being fought out in Korea. While the results of the Communist offensive were still undecided, any statement looking towards a peaceful settlement was sure to be rejected by the Chinese "which would be deemed as a try for peace by nations sorely pressed". Summary ends.

3. I am sending separate messages commenting further on the State Department's attitude towards the British suggestion for a draft declaration and on the conditions in which air action beyond the Yalu River might be undertaken.

My immediately preceding message and your EX-950 of May 1st, proposed joint declaration on Korea.

1. The following views were put to Tomlinson of the British Embassy yesterday by Hickerson and other officers of the State Department. The references are to the United Kingdom draft, which was submitted to the State Department on April 10th. Begins:

(a) The United States could never accept a proposal that a conference be called while fighting is in progress. A cease-fire must precede any conference. In any case, the United States Government could not see that a conference was necessary to bring about a cease-fire. All that was required to bring about a cessation of fighting in Korea was a will to do so on both sides. If this will existed, arrangements could be made through the commanders in the field.

(b) The composition of the conference as proposed by the United Kingdom in the text of their draft declaration was unacceptable. Apart from the People's Republic of China, the United Kingdom list included three countries which had recognized Peking. Moreover, France, so Hickerson said, tended to waver on this issue in response to developments in Indo-China. In any conference the United States would insist that the proportion of recognizing to non-recognizing countries should conform more closely to the proportion of recognizing to non-recognizing members in the United Nations.

(c) By placing the emphasis on a conference of select powers, the United Kingdom had not given recognition to the responsibilities of the United Nations some of which had been delegated to its commission in Korea and to the United Nations

Relief and Rehabilitation Agency. Moreover, the existence of the Republic of Korea had been ignored.

(d) The United States saw difficulties in having a declaration issued by the group of fourteen nations, since they could not speak upon behalf of the United Nations as a whole and this might result in other select groups, such as the Asian-Arab group issuing a contradictory statement of aims. If a further declaration of aims is made, the State Department prefer that it should take the form of a report made by the President, representing the Unified Command, addressed to the Secretary General of the United Nations, who would be asked to circulate this report to all members. Ends.

2. Hickerson made most of these points to me today after I had shown him your EX-950. With regard to point (d) above, he remarked that there had already been grumblings from Asian countries about the limitation of the State Department meetings on the Korean situation to representatives of the countries with forces in Korea, and he thought it likely that there would be an outburst from the Asian-Arab group and possibly the Latin American group if the governments of these countries took it on themselves to issue a declaration of aims.

3. He went on to say, however, that they intended to go ahead with the preparation of a report to the United Nations by the President on behalf of the Unified Command along the general lines discussed some time ago. He agreed that it was desirable to have something ready in case the military situation seemed to offer an opportunity for arranging a cease-fire. You will see from my report of today's State Department meeting that the Far East Command thinks it probable that the Chinese offensive will go through two more phases, possibly with increasing violence, before it can be regarded as ended.

4. I have not been able to talk this over with Sir Oliver Franks as he has been away from Washington all week.

KOREAN ISSUES — ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: I apologize for adding to the stream of messages I sent yesterday. You should know, however, that Hickerson telephoned me last night after giving consideration to our suggestion for an inquiry by the Additional Measures Committee addressed to all members of the United Nations about the restrictions currently imposed on trade with China. While admitting that there were some attractions in this idea at least as an intermediate step towards an embargo, he said that he was afraid that it would cause considerable delay in the consideration of the United States proposal which they intend to introduce on Monday, and that from the domestic point of view it was very important to get action as soon as possible. He referred to General MacArthur's reference here yesterday to an embargo on strategic materials, in which he declared that this should have been done long ago. He asked me to pass to you a personal appeal for your help towards getting prompt action by the United Nations.

2. Elmer Davis, who is talking sound sense about the issues raised by MacArthur, in last night's broadcast mentioned the proposed action by the A.M.C. and said: "Every delay of a day at Lake Success is likely to make about a million more votes for MacArthur's policy". I think that failure by the A.M.C. to take action soon will further discredit the United Nations in the minds of the American public and encourage the isolationist trends which MacArthur has so greatly stimulated in spite of his support of a dangerous military policy in the Far East. It will make still more difficult the approval by Congress of the foreign assistance program, which is going to have a rough time in any event.

3. There are, of course, many other considerations to be weighed in connection with the embargo besides these compelling reasons of American domestic politics. I think you should know that, in the really frightening atmosphere in Washington at this time, I attach very serious importance to the probable consequences of failure by the United Nations to take action promptly, even at the cost of renewed public differences with India and other countries. I share the view mentioned by Wilgress and Holmes of their telegrams of yesterday that the United Kingdom will come round to accepting the American proposal; if so, the more gracefully and promptly they do it the better. Ends.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. It seems to us that the only means of persuading the State Department to modify in any way their present attitude is by convincing them that they will not get a majority in the Additional Measures Committee for their recommendation. At present there is, I think, a majority of members of the committee who think the United States proposal is unwise at this time and who would join in supporting a reasonable proposal for moderating or postponing proposed action. Any such purpose would be supported, I think, by the United Kingdom, France, Australia, Belgium, and possibly Mexico. (Bebler has recommended to Belgrade that he take his seat in the AMC, but his presence during this discussion is, to say the least, doubtful.) Voting would almost certainly be close, and our position therefore is of considerable importance. The members listed above, however, could not be counted upon to oppose the American proposal in substance. The Americans recognize this fact and are therefore not overly impressed by the argument that there would be a public display of disunity. The tactical objections which we have had to their proposal are not very good material for opposition in the Assembly, and as Mr. Wrong pointed out in his telegram WA-1861 of May 3†, the arguments against the substance of the United States proposal are not particularly effective. Differences with Asian and Arab states the Americans accept as inevitable, but they point out that they would be supported by the Philippines, Thailand, and probably, as in January, by some Arab states. (Gross described the Asian-Arabs to me yesterday as a synthetic group.)

2. As for the public display of disunity, this in a sense has already begun. The American public now know that the United States has formally proposed "economic sanctions" and they understand that these are being opposed by the British and French. The effect therefore of a rejection of the United States programme in the Additional Measures Committee would do as much harm to relations among the principal allies as would a subsequent debate in the assembly, although the damage in the latter could be more widespread. If we are going to support the United States recommendations in the end, there is a good deal to be said for agreeing now before feelings in this country have become further exacerbated.

3. One argument against the United States action which we might bear in mind is that by provoking another session of the Assembly, the Americans may be stirring up trouble for themselves. It is by no means impossible that the Asian-Arabs will take the opportunity to introduce a resolution of their own and thereby force the Americans into stating their present position on the January principles.

Your telegrams Nos. 431 and 432 of May 4. Additional Measures Committee.

1. If the United States are determined to go ahead with their proposals for a U.N. selective economic embargo against China (and it seems from all accounts that they are quite firm in this), we are not (repeat not) prepared to oppose a resolution to that effect when put forward by the U.S. Delegation. Nevertheless, we remain unconvinced that this action is at all likely to contribute in any way to the solution of the Korean problem and we would have preferred to have action upon further measures deferred.

2. We had thought that the suggestion which we asked you to canvass informally, namely, that national representatives agree to make public through the A.M.C. the economic measures which they were now enforcing for denial to China of strategic materials, might have accomplished, at least as well, the immediate purposes which the U.S. Government have in mind. But we are not prepared to have you put this proposal forward to the Committee as an alternative to a U.S. resolution for a selective economic embargo.

3. If the U.S. resolution is put on Monday you should therefore vote in favour of it without however making any statement in support. If it is necessary to make any explanation you should confine yourself to indicating that, since the Canadian Government is already imposing controls upon shipments to Communist China at least as extensive as those called for by the resolution, it is prepared to support general action by the United Nations along the same lines.

4. The fact is that, while we are convinced that the action proposed by the United States will prove quite ineffectual, the issue between us is not sufficiently important for us to press further our difference with them. Indeed, it is not so much the measures now proposed by the United States that cause us concern but rather the danger that, when the results of this particular action prove illusory, we and other members of the United Nations will be urged to support progressively more severe sanctions which simply will not be enforced and may do more harm than good. For this reason we are asking Wrong to inform the State Department that your support of the present resolution must not be taken as an indication that the Canadian Government would be willing to go along with any more drastic measures at a later stage which we do not consider to be wise and for which we are convinced they will fail to secure general effective support. ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. At the meeting of the A.M.C. on 7th May, Gross submitted a draft resolution, the text of which is contained in my preceding teletype No. 447†. You will note that the operative part of this draft resolution is substantially the same as that contained in my teletype No. 438,[31] but that a paragraph has been added to the preamble. In introducing his draft resolution, Gross laid considerable emphasis on this paragraph of the preamble as pointing up that the economic measures suggested would be supplementary to the military sanctions already taken against the aggressors in Korea. He repeated the argument he had previously made, namely that the present proposal for economic measures was different from similar proposals for sanctions made in the League of Nations in that, in the present case, military measures were already being taken, and the economic measures suggested were intended not as an end in themselves but as a supplement to the military action.

2. Gross also stressed the paragraph in the operative portion of the resolution which would leave to the discretion of the individual states concerned the determination of which commodities, under the general formula, they considered should be embargoed. He said the United States thought it would be "deplorable" if the Assembly became "mired down" in a technical discussion of which specific commodities should be embargoed. In any case the resolution provided for reports back to the A.M.C. from each state regarding the items they had embargoed, and the United States considered that, in the light of these reports, general uniformity would be achieved regarding the specific items which should be banned.

3. Jebb then made a statement saying that he would be glad to transmit this resolution to his government. He said that, while he could not give any definite commitment at present, he nevertheless thought it was "quite possible" that his government would agree that the time had now come for the A.M.C. to submit such a proposal to the Assembly with the recommendation that the latter adopt it. However, Jebb indicated that his government would prefer a specific list of items which should be banned, rather than the more general formula used in the United States draft. He did not, however, make any concrete suggestion in this connection in the committee.

4. Gross replied that the United States preferred the idea of a general formula, because of the difficulty of arriving at an agreed specific list, and he thought that, as the reports from individual states came in, experience would show that there was no very great difference of opinion as to which items should be banned. In answer to a question from Nisot of Belgium, Gross indicated that the United States considered that the discretionary authority of states to determine which items should be embargoed would continue, even if a difference of opinion did develop, and that the United States did not consider that there would be any need for a further resolution of the Assembly which would spell out the formula in greater detail.

5. Both Lopez of the Philippines and Jebb indicated that, in any case, they would like to have some verbal amendment of the first operative paragraph 'b' (regarding the discretion of states to determine commodities) in a way which would make more precise the intention of the paragraph.

6. Both the Turkish and Philippine representatives said they would support the United States proposal, but no other representatives made any definite commitment at this meeting. A confusing procedural discussion then took place as to the question of referring this proposal to the existing sub-committee. LaCoste of France again urged that the proposal should be examined by the sub-committee in view of its technical features. Both the chairman (Sarper of Turkey) and Gross expressed objections to referring the proposal formally to the sub-committee, on the grounds that it would lead to unnecessary delay. However, it was finally decided that the next meeting of the full committee would take place on Monday, 14th May, and that, meanwhile, the chairman of the sub-committee (LaCoste) could call informal meetings of that body, in order to obtain further clarification of any points in the United States resolution. It was also agreed that any other members of the full committee who wished to do so could attend these informal meetings of the sub-committee.

7. It seems probable that a vote will be taken on the United States resolution at the next meeting on 14th May. Meanwhile, if you wish me to advance any amendments to the resolution, I should appreciate receiving them as early as possible, in order that I can discuss them at the informal meetings of the sub-committee referred to above.

TOP SECRET

At the Far East Department of the Foreign Office today we were shown, on an informal and confidential basis, a copy of Mr. Morrison's reply to Mr. Acheson's earlier personal message of April 30th re-stating the views of the United States Government on the Korean situation, referred to in Washington teletype WA-1884 of May 4th. This reply was sent yesterday through the British Embassy in Washington. You may be receiving a summary based upon the reply through the Commonwealth Relations Office, but since we were able to take notes the main points are summarized below for your own information:

(1) General Approach, and (2) Ending the War in Korea

The message starts by referring to the large area of common ground underlying Anglo-American policy in the Pacific, and expresses agreement with Mr. Acheson's statement that short of a change in the aggressive Communist purposes it is difficult to see how hostilities can cease. Communist aggression in Korea must be opposed with United Nations force. It goes on to say, however, that a final political settlement cannot be achieved by military force but only by negotiation.

(3) Air Counter-attack

Mr. Morrison's message states that in the event of heavy air attacks he agrees that there would be no alternative but to meet the threat by the most effective military means at our disposal, i.e., by bombing bases in China from which the original attacks are launched. This involves risks which must be foreseen. The United Kingdom Government have decided that in the event of heavy, repeat heavy, air attacks on United Nations forces from bases in Chinese territory, the United Kingdom Government will associate themselves with the policy of retaliatory action against those bases in order to prevent future attacks and reduce the loss to United Nations forces. The message emphasizes, however, that this was a decision in principle, and that it had to be borne in mind that the consequences were grave and might even involve general war. In view of the gravity of these consequences the decision to authorize such retaliatory air action should be subject to concurrence "by us" at the time. Mr. Morrison points out that it is not really a question of "confidence" but of the responsibility of the United Kingdom Government on policy matters from which they could not divest themselves. The suggestion is put forward that just as on the United Kingdom side a decision of the Prime Minister would be required to confirm the authorization for retaliatory action, it is assumed that on the United States side a presidential decision would also be required.

In recognition of the fact that such a decision might have to take place at short notice, the message requests that full factual information should be made available on the scale and nature of the Communist air attacks on United Nations forces, and suggests that possibly the British Joint Services Mission in Washington might be an appropriate channel for this purpose. Further, the request is made that full details should be made available as to the evidence bearing on such attacks, particularly in view of the fact that United Kingdom estimates of Chinese air strength are generally lower than current United States estimates.

It is also emphasized that other Commonwealth Governments, naming Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, which are contributing forces in Korea have a definite interest in this problem and that adequate consultation with them on this point would be necessary.

In stating these views, it is emphasized that they pertain to the possibility of air attack from bases in China, and that the foregoing decision did not, repeat not, apply to the case of possible attack originating from Soviet bases, which would have to be separately considered.

(4) Selective Economic Embargoes

On this point Mr. Morrison's message begins by stating that the United Kingdom is opposed to political sanctions, that such measures would not influence Chinese behaviour with regard to Korea, and might only operate to give the Russians a propaganda point. So far as economic sanctions are concerned, the message points out that with the exception of rubber no goods of direct military value from British sources had gone to China over a considerable period, and covers ground similar to that covered in two recent statements in the House of Commons by Sir Hartley Shawcross which we are reporting separately. A special point is made of the position of Hong Kong. It is pointed out that Hong Kong in Chinese Communist hands would be a menace to the South Pacific area and that if normal trade in consumer goods were cut off the population of Hong Kong would become a likely target for Communist infiltration. Steps would be taken to ensure that no exports to China which would contribute to the Chinese war effort went from Hong Kong. But to cut off all commercial contacts would make no difference to the fighting in Korea and would mean the ultimate loss of an important centre of free speech and western ideas in the whole area. The phrase is used: "I am sure you would not wish to give Hong Kong to the Chinese".

It is also pointed out that the United Kingdom is opposed to general as distinct from selective economic sanctions against China, and the argument made that such measures would not obtain general support among the Europeans and Asians. While agreeing to the principle of a selective embargo, the Good Offices Committee should be given the opportunity of continuing its efforts to establish contact with Peking. The United Kingdom Government has decided that they would not press for any delay in the presentation of a resolution dealing with a selective economic embargo from the Additional Measures Committee to the Assembly.

(5) Admission of Communist Chinese Representatives to the United Nations

On this point the message re-states the United Kingdom position that Communist China is a political fact, which must be "recognized", and states that in the opinion of the United Kingdom Government the legal arguments are conclusive. It adds that the United Kingdom Government could in no way act to imply support for the fiction that Chiang Kai-Shek's representative in the United Nations could speak for China. You will recall that Mr. Acheson had suggested that a "moratorium" should be placed on the question, and in Mr. Morrison's reply he asks for further clarification of what is implied by a "moratorium".

(6) Public Declaration

Here Mr. Morrison agrees that the time is not propitious for the issuance of a public declaration of aims. At the same time he expresses the view that it is important to give a lead to public opinion on the general aims of United Nations policy and expresses the view that if a stalemate should be reached in the fighting such a declaration would have considerable value. He hopes, therefore, that Mr. Acheson would continue to consider this possibility further with Sir Oliver Franks in the hope that a statement could be eventually issued.

2. The foregoing are the principal points in the message.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. At the meeting at 10.30 a.m. today (14 May) the AMC adopted the revised United States draft resolution calling for an embargo on the shipment of strategic materials to China and North Korea. The vote was 11 in favour (including Canada), none against, 1 abstention (Egypt) with 2 absent (Burma and Yugoslavia). In my immediately following message I am sending you the text of the revised resolution as adopted.[32]

2. The meeting was an open meeting. Apparently the chairman had made arrangements beforehand to have the meeting open without consulting all members of the committee. Therefore, when the meeting began, large numbers of the press were present and no discussion took place as to whether the meeting should be open or closed.

3. Gross was the first speaker and introduced the revised United States resolution. He said that the changes made during the informal sub-committee meetings were of an "editorial" nature and that they did not affect the substance of the resolution. He then described the intention of the three component parts of the resolution in the same way that he had done at the closed meeting on 7 May (our teletype No. 448). He concluded by emphasizing that adoption of this resolution would not mean that the GOC had failed in its work but that, on the contrary, it was the hope of the United States delegation that the adoption of this resolution would strengthen the hand of the GOC in its negotiations.

4. Shann then spoke as rapporteur of the committee and presented a draft report from the AMC to the assembly. The first part of this report was purely factual but the last part contained a number of interpretations of paragraphs of the United States draft resolution agreed to by the majority of members at the informal meetings of the sub-committee. Subsequently, this report was approved at to-day's meeting of the AMC, with Mexico reserving its position on the interpretative parts of the report because of "lack of instructions". I am sending you in a separate teletype† the section of the report containing these interpretative comments.

5. Jebb then said that the United Kingdom would "wholeheartedly" support the United States draft resolution. He added that, while they had previously had some doubts about the timing of the resolution, they would no longer insist on this point of view in view of the demonstrated unwillingness of Peking to enter into negotiations. However, Jebb did say that, so far as the last paragraph B of the resolution was concerned, (regarding the continuation of the consideration of additional measures), the United Kingdom hoped that any consideration of further additional measures by the AMC would be limited to the consideration of specific extensions of the embargo on strategic materials. LaCoste of France made a similar statement supporting the United States resolution and also agreeing with the United Kingdom comment regarding this paragraph B.

6. The representatives of Belgium, the Philippines, Venezuela and Brazil then announced their support for the United States resolution. Shann of Australia also supported the resolution, saying that, while the Australians still had some doubts about the timing of the resolution, they considered that these doubts were greatly outweighed by the necessity of having a "show of unity" among the democracies.

7. I then said that, as Canada was already imposing at least as broad restrictions on trade to China as were proposed in this resolution, we would be willing to support United Nations action along the same general lines.

8. Sarper of Turkey supported the resolution, but only as a "bare minimum". He emphasized strongly that Turkey believed more stringent additional measures would be needed in the future.

9. Fawzi Bey of Egypt made no comment in explanation of his abstention. Following the vote on the United States resolution (with the result given above), the committee then approved the draft report to the assembly, with a notation concerning Mexico's reservation on the interpretative portions.

10. After the meeting, LaCoste of France showed me a small amendment which his delegation is planning to introduce in the Political Committee regarding the first operative paragraph A of the resolution. This amendment would add to the general list of items which should be embargoed "transportation material of strategic importance". The French consider that, by specifying transportation material of this type, the resolution will be strengthened and they indicated to me that the United States had accepted this amendment. The United Kingdom have referred the amendment to London. I would appreciate your instructions as to what reply I should give to LaCoste regarding the Canadian views on this proposed amendment. It now looks as if the Political Committee will meet on Thursday, 17 May.

Le représentant permanent par intérim auprès des Nations Unies au sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures

Acting Permanent Representative to United Nations to Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL New York, May 15, 1951

Dear Escott [Reid],

I am enclosing for your own information a draft letter I prepared yesterday under the influence of anger. It has to do primarily with the behaviour of our American colleagues, a behaviour which after yesterday's meeting I considered intolerable, and which now that I have cooled seems damned annoying. This morning I was going to tear it up but I thought perhaps there would be some value in communicating the information and the impressions contained in it to you. Although I may have gone a little far in the conclusions to which I was led by what was perhaps a minor matter, I am still convinced that there are tendencies in United States behaviour which need to be watched carefully.

2. On this expedition to New York I am struck with the extent to which the whole United Nations has been Americanized in the past year. The U.S. Mission, it seems to me, are taking for granted rights and privileges which I am sure they would not have assumed a year ago. And those countries which formerly would not have tolerated such behaviour are cowed by the fury of the U.S. press and Congress, and of course by the brute facts of the inequality of power, particularly in Korea. The Secretary-General since the lamentable events of last autumn is no longer in a position for independent manoeuvre.

3. A good many people are quite unhappy about this situation, including a good many Americans of the Secretariat and in the press corps. Even the most friendly Americans, however, seem convinced that the rest of us have not upheld our share in the Korean enterprise and that the best way of checking a tendency which they and we dislike is to increase our fighting forces. Even non-American members of the Secretariat, although they appreciate the strategic difficulties better than do the Americans, nevertheless express strong hopes that other countries can find a way of so enlarging their United Nations forces that some kind of proper balance will be restored. Leo Malania for instance, who could scarcely be more unsympathetic with the U.S. position and U.S. tactics, argued very strongly some time ago that the best possible response on the part of Western European and Commonwealth countries to the dismissal of General MacArthur would be immediate announcements of the sending of additional forces to Korea. He called me yesterday to say that some of the men in the Secretariat had been discussing the forthcoming discussion in the Assembly on Additional Measures. They hoped very much that the Commonwealth countries in particular would seek to avoid the impression that they were coming along reluctantly under United States pressure and rather to take their place in the van of those upholding the U.N. cause.

4. These are rambling thoughts which need not be taken too seriously, and I hope you don't conclude I have lost all sense of proportion.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN [HOLMES]

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Projet d'une lettre du représentant permanent par intérim auprès des Nations Unies au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Draft Letter from Acting Permanent Representative to United Nations to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [New York], May 14, 1951

ADDITIONAL MEASURES COMMITTEE

1. One of the disturbing aspects of recent activities of the Additional Measures Committee has been the attitude adopted towards a "closed meeting".

2. As you will recall, it was agreed at the first meeting of the Committee that its sessions should be closed but that this rule might be changed if the members of the Committee agreed. We had no strong views on the necessity of closing the doors for these meetings, but when a majority of members had decided that they should be closed we accepted this decision and have treated the discussions in the A.M.C. as private. The press was not happy about this ruling and protested in the early stages.

3. In spite of the supposed confidential nature of the discussions in the Committee, the newspapers have contained as full and as accurate reports of such meetings as they have of open sessions in the United Nations. The reason is that the United States Representative has adopted a practice of holding a press conference after the meetings, at which he explains not only the United States position but also the position taken by other countries. It may be that the United States Representative is not the single source of information available to the press, but the supplementary information which is given by other Representatives, and, I think, by members of the Secretariat as well, may be attributed to the feeling that there is not much point in maintaining silence. It has not been necessary for us to report on these meetings to Canadian correspondents even if we wished to do so. The correspondents, however, have frequently telephoned to check Mr. Gross's report of what we had said in the meeting.

4. While the desire of the United States Mission to impress upon the people of this country the energy with which they are pressing for additional measures against China may be understandable, these practices have become humiliating to other members of the Committee. When our Australian colleague protested in vigorous terms to the press liaison officer of the U.S. Mission for presuming to report what the Australian Representative had said in the Committee, he was told that he had no right to interfere in regulations between the United States Mission and the people of the United States, and given a lecture on the unique respect for freedom of speech and the press possessed by the people of the United States.

5. In spite of their circumvention of the Committee's rules, the United States Mission has been anxious to open the doors at A.M.C. meetings. They have found a willing instrument in the Chairman of the Committee, Mr. Sarper. At a previous session, Mr. Sarper endeavoured to declare a meeting open rather than closed before Representatives had time to realize what was happening. At that particular session both the United Kingdom and Australian Representatives had remarks to make about the unwisdom of the United States proposals which they were most anxious to make confidentially. They managed therefore to protest against the Chairman's ruling, and they were supported by the rest of the Committee. The United States Mission was determined, however, to have an open meeting when their resolution came up for a vote today. At about half past one last Saturday afternoon, at the tail end of a Sub-committee meeting to consider the text of the resolution, Mr. Ross calmly referred in the course of discussing some other subject to his understanding that the meeting would be open on Monday, the implication being that there had been a general desire for this. I challenged this assumption, on the grounds that it was very difficult for Delegations not to know whether a meeting would be open or closed, because their Governments would undoubtedly give them different instructions as to what to say in an open as distinct from a closed meeting. The Venezuelan Representative indicated that he too would like to know in advance, and a suggestion was made that the Chairman should consult the Representatives. In order that there should be no misunderstanding, I explained that I was not pressing for a closed meeting and that personally I saw certain advantages in officially recognizing that the meetings were open.

6. Certainly nothing which could have been interpreted as a decision on this question was taken, or could have been taken, at the purely informal meeting on Saturday, at which not all the members of the Committee were represented. Nevertheless, I learned on Sunday that the press had been informed that the meeting would be open, and it was so announced in this morning's newspapers. Consequently, when we arrived for the meeting, we found the room filled with newspapermen as well as representatives of Delegations not represented on the Committee. As the Chairman had not communicated with us or, so far as I am aware, with other Delegations, I assumed that he would put the matter to the Committee at the beginning of the meeting. The meeting began, however, with no reference whatever having been made to this question. Although I should have liked very much to raise the question, it was not an opportune time to do so. It would have been necessary to put oneself in a position in front of all the press of seeming to oppose their attendance. Without instructions from you on this subject, I did not think it wise to complicate thus the more important issues of the day.

7. I am reporting this aspect of the work of the A.M.C. not only because we should consider future policy on this particular question of open or closed meetings when the Committee begins meeting again, but also because it is, I think, an example of an increasing assumption by the United States Mission of the right to manipulate United Nations bodies as they wish. For the most part proper forms of democracy are observed, but it seems to me that the Americans are becoming increasingly cynical even in their pretences. They would be indignant, no doubt, if they were confronted with charges of this kind, and I am sure they do not realize what they are doing. As usual they are so absorbed in the crusade of the moment that they cannot think very much about their scruples. They are aided by what seems to me an increasing tendency on the part of those who dislike this behaviour to consider that there is little use resisting. I found that although the Australians, Belgians, French, and others to whom I spoke on this subject shared my view that the situation was lamentable, there was a tendency on their part to consider it somewhat ingenuous on my part to do anything but shrug my shoulders. As my Australian colleague said, "You've got to get used to realizing who's running things here now".

8. It would be a mistake, I realize, to see these difficulties out of perspective. It would certainly be a great mistake for any country to determine its attitude on the U.S. draft resolution on the basis of pique over American behaviour in the Committee. As candid friends I think we might take note of a tendency, the results of which will not be good for the United Nations or for the United States.

9. One has the impression from time to time that our work in the United Nations is purely a sideshow for the main spectacle in Washington. We are in danger of losing our independence of judgment because of the increasing extent to which our judgment is guided by what we consider to be the impact of our policies on American public opinion. It is not only that the U.S. Mission remind us of this important factor and urge us to adopt policies which will ease the position of the Administration, but also that even the non-American Representatives have become so obsessed with the national controversies of this country that they have lost sight of opinion in Leeds and Liège, and certainly Lucknow.

10. We are not in a good position to control developments because, having given in to the pressure of American public opinion on two occasions, we have very much weakened our bargaining position. I do not wish to suggest that we were wrong in voting for the United States resolutions in the Assembly in January and this week in the Additional Measures Committee. Faced with these resolutions there was no alternative to supporting them. In doing so, however, we have fulfilled the predictions made by the United States Mission. There was never any hope of our shaking them in their resolve to press on with these resolutions because they were confident from the beginning that we would go along with them. So far no great harm has been done, but it is very doubtful if the United States Administration intends to stop here with "sanctions" — or could stop here if it wished. If we do not wish to support any further proposals for Additional Measures, it will not be easy to convince the Americans that we will continue to oppose them right through to the end of a vote in plenary session of the Assembly. At times I am at a loss to think of any means by which we can oppose them even on minor matters — as for instance the procedural question of an open or closed meeting. With the United States press in full cry breathing down our neck — arrogantly confident of its own sacred right to decide all issues — it takes a good deal of courage, and perhaps illusions of grandeur, to resist.

SECRET. IMPORTANT.

Repeat Washington No. 362.

ADDITIONAL MEASURES AGAINST CHINA

1. The assembly in plenary session this morning passed the resolution [with the French amendment] proposing a selective economic embargo by 47 in favour [including Canada], none against, with 8 abstentions, and 5 members not participating in the vote. The majority was increased over that in committee by Ecuador, which received instructions overnight, and by the Luxembourg Minister who came from Washington to vote. The session was prolonged by the insistence of the Soviet Bloc repeating their arguments about the unconstitutionality of the measure in the guise of explanations of their votes.

2. This telegram is not intended as a summary of the sessions in committee and plenary as these have been fully reported in the U.N. teleprinter and the press. These are merely a few impressions of the debate.

3. The decision of the Soviet delegation to reject the right of the assembly to consider such a resolution and therefore not to participate in the vote greatly assisted the United States in securing a swift passage with a minimum amount of controversy. Such embarrassing questions as the United States attitude to the January principles were never even alluded to, and as the Russians were not raising substantive matters, India and other countries who wished to abstain were only too happy to explain their votes briefly and get the session over with. Even on the constitutional argument the Russians fared rather badly when Gross this morning surprised them by quoting their views in 1946 on the right and duty of the assembly to declare diplomatic and economic sanctions against Spain (an idea which Walter O'Hearn of the Egoreal [sic] Star had suggested to the United States delegation yesterday through their Information Officer).[33]

8. Although the absence of controversy was gratifying, there is some anxiety on the part of Commonwealth and western European countries about the conclusions which may be drawn in the United States from the size of the majority and the ineffectiveness of the opposition. The United States Mission are jubilant and frankly admit they had no idea it would be so easy. The New York press is cheering the smashing victory in what the Daily News significantly calls in its front page headline "first boycott against China". If a sober journal like The New York Times considered that the vote in the A.M.C. indicated readiness for further action (paragraph 5 of our telegram No. 471 of May 15),† they will certainly interpret the vote in the assembly as more than confirmation of this impression. Delegations like the Philippines, Brazil and Thailand made clear that this resolution did not go far enough, and Tsiang specifically demanded "diplomatic sanctions".

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], May 19, 1951

Attached is copy No. 11 of telegram Y-254 of May 11, 1951,† containing the text of Mr. Morrison's letter to Mr. Acheson on the Korean war.[35] Sir Alexander Clutterbuck, in an interview with me earlier in the week, asked for comments on the portion of the letter which deals with the bombing of bases in China. I outline below some of the points I should raise with Sir Alexander when he comes back to hear our views, if you approve.

2. Mr. Morrison, in paragraph 3, states that if heavy air attacks are made on United Nations forces there will be no alternative but to bomb the bases in China from which the attacks have been launched. This is in accord with your statement in the House of Commons on May 7 in which you envisaged a situation in which allied planes would pursue enemy bombers back to, and attempt to destroy, the Manchurian air bases from which they came.

3. In paragraph 5, Mr. Morrison says that, while he agrees in principle to the decision to take retaliatory action, he cannot agree to the actual initiation of such action without consultation at the time of the provocation which requires counter-action. At some length he outlines the machinery which the United Kingdom can make available to ensure that it can be consulted promptly during a crisis. This differs from the position you took on May 7 when you said "It is possible to visualize a situation in which immediate retaliatory action without prior consultation might be unavoidable in pursuing enemy bombers back to, and in attempting to destroy, the Manchurian air bases from which they came". While, therefore, you desire that consultation with all the interested parties should take place at the time of provocation, you consider that there may be circumstances in which time does not permit of consultation, but the United Kingdom does not consider that such a situation can be permitted to exist in view of the consequences which may follow upon air action against China.[36]

4. In his paragraph 6, Mr. Morrison pleads that the decision on the United States side to bomb China be made by the President himself and asks that authority to make this decision be not delegated. This again differs from the position we have taken. In his telegram WA-1801 of May 1† Mr. Wrong reported that "General Ridgway has been given authority, in case of an air attack from Manchuria, so extensive and dangerous to the United Nations forces as to satisfy him that prompt counter-action is required, to order retaliation if he is unable physically to communicate with Washington".[37] No action has been taken to inform the State Department that this authorization is unacceptable and, unless such action is taken, presumably we have no objection to the authorization.[38]

5. The United Kingdom authorities take the view that this circumstance cannot possibly arise. They have pointed out to us orally that General Ridgway in Tokyo has at his disposal special radio communications, ordinary commercial radio communications, telephone communications, submarine cables which run both east and west from Japan to the United States, and the facilities of United States warships in Japanese waters the wireless sets of which can reach Honolulu at the very least. They therefore deny that General Ridgway can in fact be cut off from communication with Washington unless he himself wishes to be cut off.[39] Paragraph 6 of Mr. Morrison's letter is probably an attempt to make British incredulity apparent.

6. In summary, both the United Kingdom and ourselves have placed the same limitation on the sort of air action which can be permitted. We both consider that it must be confined to the air bases from which actual attacks on United Nations forces take place. On the other two points, however, our positions diverge as we have allowed the United States greater latitude than the United Kingdom has. We would, however, no doubt hope that the United Kingdom would be successful in securing United States agreement to its insistence that the United Kingdom be consulted before actual retaliation takes place.[40] It is not that the United Kingdom in this case would in any constitutional sense be speaking for us. The United Kingdom might, however, be able to impose a certain amount of restraint upon the United States which we could only welcome. If, of course, time permits the United States to consult us we should expect the United States to do so but, as the British have pointed out to us orally, it is likely that any provocation will be accompanied by such an emotional crisis that the United States will in fact deny that there is any opportunity for consultation. Similarly, we should probably welcome United Kingdom success in urging on the United States that the President himself rather than

Dear Sir Alexander [Clutterbuck],

When you were in to see me last week you asked for my comments on the portion of Mr. Morrison's letter to Mr. Acheson which concerned the possible necessity of bombing bases in China.

There appear to be three points at issue: the nature of air attacks on China, the necessity for consultation before the bombing takes place, and who is to authorize such bombing on behalf of the United States.

I think that the position taken by Mr. Morrison on the nature of the bombing is the same as my own. Mr. Morrison implies that air attacks should be confined to the bases in China from which attacks on United Nations forces have been launched. I had the same limitation in mind when I said in the House of Commons that allied planes might have to pursue enemy bombers back to, and attempt to destroy, the Manchurian air bases from which they came.[42] We appear to agree that bombing is permissible only against bases which are actually used to launch attacks against United Nations forces and that we do not contemplate general retaliatory bombing.

I note that, while Mr. Morrison has agreed in principle that bombing might have to be undertaken, he has not given his consent to the initiation of such attacks as yet and that he cannot convey United Kingdom consent until his government has had an opportunity to decide that some specific instance of attack has been sufficient to warrant counter-action. While I too have conceded the principle that air action against China may become necessary, I have maintained that, except in the unlikely event that communication between Tokyo and Washington should be physically impossible, such action should not be initiated until we have had an opportunity to be consulted. This is still my position.

The Canadian government has not contemplated an approach to the United States government with a request that the decision on the United States side to initiate bombing of Chinese bases should be taken by the President himself rather

VII. CONTRIBUTIONS TO THE UNITED NATIONS FORCES IN KOREA AND THE INTEGRATED FORCE IN EUROPE

28. The Minister of National Defence, referring to the discussions in Cabinet on December 28, 1950, January 24, 1951 and February 1, 1951, said that, when the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee had been in Washington on February 19th, he had conferred with General Bradley, Chairman of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, and General Collins, Chief of Staff, U.S. Army, regarding Canadian Army contributions to the United Nations forces in Korea and to the Integrated Force in Western Europe.[43]

29. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee recalled that, originally, a brigade group had been offered to the United Nations, subject to completion of training, and that the offer had been accepted. In November, when it appeared that the action in Korea would end shortly, the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff had indicated that one battalion for occupation duties would be the total Canadian Army requirement in Korea. While the State Department was considering confirmation of this view to the Canadian Government, the situation in Korea had deteriorated as a result of the Chinese assault and it had taken no further action. The Second Battalion, Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, had then been despatched to Korea and the rest of the Canadian Brigade Group had remained at Fort Lewis, Washington, to complete its training.

During his discussions with General Bradley on February 19th, the latter had indicated that the Chinese had recently had a serious set-back in Korea. The line had been stabilized, although it was not an unbroken line and allowed for considerable manoeuvring by both sides. Chinese casualties had been very heavy. The position of the U.N. forces was quite good. Their morale and training had greatly improved under General Ridgway, although the South Korean divisions were still not dependable. The U.S. troops had been reorganized into two corps and were now much better soldiers. Because of the gaps in the front and the instability of the South Korean troops, Chinese infiltration behind U.N. formations was now quite normal but a technique had been developed for relieving surrounded U.N. troops after a considerable toll had been taken of the Chinese. Chinese equipment was still primitive.

The Unified Command intended to fight a war of attrition roughly in the present position and, although amphibious attacks and thrusts through the enemy land front might be made continuously, no general advance was planned. The aim was to demonstrate to the Communists that their superiority in numbers was to no avail against determined troops with first-class equipment. The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff hoped that, as a result, the Communists might think twice before initiating any other operations in Asia. While realizing that these tactics might create a stalemate in Korea, they felt that, if they could take a sufficient toll of the Communists, the latter might be more ready to negotiate a settlement. General Bradley did not anticipate any major campaigns by the Communists before June, when movement of the heavy equipment of the U.N. forces would be difficult.

General Bradley considered that, while General Ridgway was able to hold the Communists, he still had no troops to spare and was running considerable risks with the South Koreans. It was not possible for his troops to be relieved from the line to rest. The Americans were sending to Korea eight additional artillery regiments, as well as 25,000 reinforcements. They had no intention of sending further formations but would keep their units up to strength. For the last month U.N. casualties had been light, but the divisions had never been built up since the disastrous withdrawal from North Korea.

General Bradley had expressed to him the view that the Canadians should fulfil their offer to send a full brigade group to Korea in spite of the desirability of despatching forces immediately to the Integrated Force. He had pointed out that the other nations concerned had made good their offers and had suggested that it would be misunderstood in both military and political circles if the U.N. troops engaged in Korea had to continue to fight without rest and the Canadian offer remained unfulfilled.

As regards plans for U.S. contributions to the Integrated Force, one division would be sent in April, one in the latter part of June, one in September, and possibly one in November. These would be only half-trained and would have to complete their training in Europe. General Bradley thought that any Canadian contribution would be very acceptable. He had suggested that it might be despatched to Europe in one of the periods between the sailings of the U.S. divisions, and that August might be soon enough for this movement.

He had emphasized to General Bradley Canada's difficulty in both meeting the commitment in Korea and providing one-third of a division for Europe, with the reinforcement problem in Korea and the problem of rotation in Europe after eighteen months. General Bradley had commented that he could not visualize the present Korean situation continuing that long.

General Bradley had mentioned to him that, while General MacArthur was confident that the Communists in Japan would not make much headway, there was anxiety over reports that Japanese prisoners in Russian hands had been formed into divisions in northeast Manchuria. As these troops might make a move against Japan, the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff were considering sending two half-trained divisions to bolster Japan while the Korean situation lasted. If the Korean war were brought to an end, it was intended to post four divisions to Japan.

General Collins, whom he had seen next, had expressed the same views as General Bradley with regard to Korea, and had said that he could not recommend to the Unified Command that the remainder of the Canadian brigade group was not required there.

General Collins had mentioned that the situation in Yugoslavia was giving considerable concern, there being some possibility of a move against that country this spring. General Collins had enquired whether any surplus Canadian equipment could be supplied to Yugoslavia and had been informed that it was all committed to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Tito, with whose staff the Americans had had talks, had indicated that any equipment provided from Western sources should be supplied as quietly as possible. As the Yugoslavs preferred Soviet equipment, such equipment of that type as was being captured in Korea was being passed on to the Yugoslavs.[44]

After his discussions with Generals Bradley and Collins, he had talked with the Standing Group and warned it that Canada would have to re-examine the timing of its contribution to the Integrated Force in the light of the request for more troops for Korea.

30. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said that, on February 19th, the State Department had confirmed the report given to the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, that the Unified Command had been considering the force requirements for Korea in the light of the strategy of stabilizing the front and carrying on a campaign of attrition in the hope that this would induce the Chinese Communist Government to negotiate a satisfactory settlement. In so doing, the State Department had conveyed to the Embassy in Washington an official request from the Unified Command that the Canadian Government consider (a) announcing at an early date an intention to send to Korea further contingents of the Special Force, which was expected to complete its training at Fort Lewis by April 1st, and (b) having these contingents leave for Korea prior to completion of their training. Further, it had been explained to the Embassy that the Unified Command desired additional force contributions by other U.N. members in view of the importance of maintaining the U.N. character of the operation. It was therefore making similar approaches to several other members, including Australia, New Zealand, Greece, Turkey, Brazil, Colombia, Chile and Mexico.

In view of Canada's offer of a brigade group, it appeared desirable to comply with the request of the Unified Command. He thought the Unified Command might be unduly optimistic about the possibilities of an aggressive war of attrition bringing Communist China to terms in the near future.

31. General Foulkes did not think the Chinese were likely to make an early withdrawal from Korea. To permit this, however, they might re-equip the North Koreans who would then be able to maintain a stiff opposition. The Americans were anxious to reduce their commitments in Korea as soon as possible, with a view to concentrating their efforts in Western Europe. To this end they might possibly build up the South Korean forces with heavy equipment.

32. Mr. Claxton said that the Canadian troops at Fort Lewis were in an advanced state of training. Their Commanding Officer would be in Ottawa on February 28th, when he could be consulted as to their readiness for despatch to Korea.

33. General Foulkes suggested that, since this request was bound to leak out in Washington, and as the U.S. authorities knew that the Canadians at Fort Lewis were far better trained than the U.S. troops that had been sent to Korea, it would be advantageous to announce, as soon as possible, the despatch of further elements of the Special Force.

34. The Prime Minister said that, as Canada had offered a full brigade group and the Unified Command had now officially requested the despatch of the remainder of it to Korea, it appeared very desirable to agree to the request promptly. While the Unified Command was perhaps somewhat optimistic about the prospects in Korea, it appeared to have adopted the only strategy open to it in present circumstances. Its request for additional troops from Canada and a number of other U.N. members was apparently being made not only because reinforcements were needed but, also, in the not unreasonable hope that, if the Chinese Communists saw that an impressive proportion of the United Nations were determined to prevent their aggression from succeeding, they would be more inclined to recognize the futility of their campaign and agree to negotiate a reasonable settlement.

35. The Committee, after further discussion, noted the reports of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, regarding the request of the Unified Command for an early announcement that additional contingents of the Canadian Army Special Force be sent to Korea and that they be despatched before completion of their training at Fort Lewis on April 1st, and agreed to recommend to Cabinet the despatch to Korea, as soon as possible, of the remainder of the 25th Brigade Group originally offered to the United Nations; the early announcement of this plan; and notification of it to the Unified Command, through the State Department.[45]

Attached for your information is a copy of letter No. 239 of March 10, 1951, from Tokyo, in which Mr. Menzies discusses sympathetically the possibility that Canada might take the initiative in negotiations for the formation of a Commonwealth Division in Korea.

It occurs to me that the points raised by Mr. Menzies might appropriately be considered in conjunction with the account given in the letter transmitted under General Odlum's despatch No. 83 of February 19, 1951.† This letter, of which a copy was sent to you on March 7, is a detailed statement by a British officer, apparently of some considerable background and intelligence, of his experience in the Korean fighting toward the end of 1950. He argues that the formation of a Commonwealth Division, with a Commonwealth command and headquarters staff, would be very valuable from a purely practical point of view in conserving the lives of Commonwealth troops and in ensuring, as far as possible, their efficient employment.

Mr. Menzies' recent letter is in general accord with the views expressed orally by Brigadier Fleury.

LETTER NO. 239 Tokyo, March 10, 1951

CANADIAN BRIGADE FOR KOREA — COMMAND AND SUPPORT PROBLEMS

The decision to send a full Canadian brigade to Korea raises certain political questions concerning command and support on which I will venture to submit my views in this letter.

2. The only information which I have concerning the decision to send additional Canadian forces to Korea, apart from that available in the public press, was contained in a copy of teletype WA-635 of February 19† from Washington, conveying the official request from the Unified Command. I do not know what considerations dictated the Government's decision in this matter, but I assume that the following points were taken into account:

(a) Public statements by Government leaders said that the Special Force would, when trained, be sent to Korea if it appeared that was where they could be most usefully employed then.

(b) It would be difficult to turn down a request from the United States for use of these troops in Korea when the United States was already supplying such a large proportion of the United Nations troops, and when the United States Government had indicated that it had weighed the Korean against the European requirement.

(c) Canada's voice in the discussion of Far Eastern problems inside and outside the United Nations would be stronger if backed by a larger military contingent in Korea.

3. It seems to me that, if Canada is to get the most out of this contribution of a further 5,500 men, careful political as well as military administrative attention should be given to the arrangements for their use here. Our brigade of 6,400 men will rank as the fourth largest military group in Korea, after the United States, Republic of Korea and United Kingdom (about 10,000) contingents. I think that we should look pretty carefully at just how our Brigade will fit into the United Nations Force in Korea, in order that our contribution will have the maximum desired effect.

4. When our Brigade arrives in Korea, there will be three Commonwealth Brigades there: (a) the wholly U.K. and strong 29th Brigade, (b) the 27th Brigade, made up of two U.K. infantry battalions, (Middlesex and Argylls), an infantry battalion of the Royal Australian Regiment, a regiment of New Zealand field artillery, the Indian Field Hospital, but short some supporting units, and (c) our 25th Brigade. Because these three brigades use largely British-type equipment, it will be necessary for them to operate near each other so that they can be served by the same line of communications. Right now, the 27th and 29th Brigades are not serving together, but they never are permitted to get far apart because they draw from a common supply line. It would be most logical for the three brigades to serve together in one division. This would have the following advantages:

(a) The brigades would use a single supply line which would be more economical even than three brigades operating separately near each other.

(b) The brigades would be commanded by a divisional headquarters that operated on the same basis as they did.

(c) A division commander and staff would carry more weight with United States Corps, Army and Theatre Commanders than three separate brigade commanders with their smaller headquarters.

(d) A division would make more of a public impression than three brigades as you will notice most of the reporting is about the operation of divisions as news reporters operate from divisional headquarters at the lowest.

(e) A cooperative effort to establish and operate a divisional headquarters would serve a constructive purpose. It would demonstrate to other Commonwealth Governments that, when practical considerations dictate, we are as prepared to put an effort into cooperation with other Commonwealth Governments as we are with the United States when different practical considerations suggest another pattern of military cooperation.

5. It seems to me altogether likely that the U.N. Command will seek to have these three brigades associated in one division. I understand that the United Kingdom is not being asked to supply more troops and that it would be very difficult for them to do so. We do not know here yet what response there will be in Australia and New Zealand to the request of the Unified Command for additional troops. Perhaps one of them would supply the missing Service units for the 27th Brigade. Then there will just be the question of a divisional headquarters and divisional service and supply units. It seems to me that, if a divisional headquarters is to be established, it should be a cooperative venture, rather than being staffed by officers of one nationality only. I can see the possibility of minor frictions and some public misunderstanding if an Australian major-general, for instance, commanded the division and had a wholly Australian divisional headquarters staff.

6. I understand that the present British Commonwealth Occupation Forces base facilities in Japan which we are now using for the logistic support of the Second Battalion of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry are already pretty heavily taxed by the 27th and 29th Brigades. It may be necessary for us to contribute some administrative personnel to BCOF when our brigade comes out.

7. Brigadier Fleury is returning to Canada this weekend for consultations in National Defence Headquarters on various questions connected with the command and support for the Canadian brigade. I have written this letter to suggest that, in addition to military administrative problems, there is a political side to these questions which should be considered. It seems to me that, if necessary to round out and make more effective our contribution, we should be prepared to consider locating extra men for a divisional headquarters and for logistic support, and should take the initiative, if necessary, in discussing arrangements with other Commonwealth Governments.

8. I have discussed this matter with Brigadier Fleury. He is far more familiar with the practical problems involved and their implications than I am. Since you have invited me to express my opinions on the use of Canadian forces in Korea, I thought it might not be out of place for me to write and draw the political aspects of this problem to your attention as I fancy that National Defence Headquarters may be more immediately concerned with the difficult manpower and other military administrative problems involved in the decision of the Government to send out the brigade and probably not too anxious to contemplate at this stage anything more. My point is that, if 10% more effort is required to make our contribution fully effective, then such an additional effort should be considered from the political as well as the military administrative point of view.

TOP SECRET Ottawa, April 9, 1951

FORMATION OF DIVISION OF COMMONWEALTH TROOPS IN KOREA

Attached is a copy of a note on the formation of a division of Commonwealth troops in Korea left with me on April 6 by Sir Alexander Clutterbuck.

It will be observed that the note proposes the formation of a division of ground forces from Commonwealth countries under the title "First (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations Forces". This was the title agreed to by the Government some time ago.[46] The memorandum proposes the formation of this division as soon as feasible after the arrival of the remainder of the Canadian brigade.

I understand that informal discussions have already taken place at the Service level and that National Defence is examining the matter. I am inclined to think that from an operational standpoint there is much to be said for this development.[47]

Copies of the memorandum have gone to the Chiefs of Staff Committee with the suggestion that they report to the Cabinet Defence Committee as soon as feasible.

I am enclosing a copy of this memorandum addressed to the Prime Minister should you wish to send it forward.[48]

FORMATION OF DIVISION OF COMMONWEALTH TROOPS IN KOREA

The question of the possible formation of a division of Commonwealth troops in Korea has been the subject of recent exchanges between the Canadian Chief of General Staff and the Chief of the Imperial General Staff. United Kingdom Ministers have now decided that, if the other Commonwealth Governments concerned agree, the United Kingdom should link its land forces in Korea with theirs to form a division of Commonwealth troops. The United Kingdom Government regard such a division as a most desirable objective with important advantages both in the military and in the international field.

2. After consulting General MacArthur, the United Kingdom Government have decided to maintain two United Kingdom brigades, less one battalion, in Korea for the time being. In the United Kingdom view, the division might comprise these two United Kingdom brigades (less the one battalion) together, as they would hope, with the Canadian 25th Infantry Brigade and the Australian, New Zealand and Indian contingents which are at present attached to the United Kingdom 27th Brigade.

3. As regards timing, the United Kingdom Government consider that the objective should be to form the division as soon as possible after the arrival in the Korean theatre of the balance of the Canadian 25th Brigade, which it is understood will take place in May. The programme at present contemplated by the United Kingdom Government is that the additional United Kingdom personnel involved, which are referred to in paragraph 6 below, should be assembled in the United Kingdom or in the Middle East by the end of May and despatched to Korea without further training. The completion of their training will be carried out in Korea if this is approved by the Unified Command. Delay in these proposed timings may be imposed by difficulties involved in the provision of shipping for vehicles and equipment.

4. Should this be acceptable to the other Governments concerned, the United Kingdom Government would be ready to make available a United Kingdom officer as Divisional Commander.

5. In their view the staff of the Commander should be an integrated one with officers serving on it from all the contributing Commonwealth countries. As in the case of the 27th Brigade, the division would come under United States operational control and under the non-operational control of the Commander-in-Chief of the British Commonwealth Occupation Force in Japan.

6. The United Kingdom War Office have had exploratory talks with the military liaison representatives in London of Canada, Australia and New Zealand as to how the additional troops required for the division might be provided, and the United Kingdom authorities are basing their plans for the moment on the assumption that New Zealand will be able to provide

(i) the Headquarters of a R.N.Z.A.S.C. infantry division transport platoon,

(ii) one R.N.Z.A.S.C. infantry division transport company,

(iii) one Light Aid Detachment.

The United Kingdom Government are ready to find the remaining divisional troops except that they hope that Canada, Australia, New Zealand and India will be in a position to contribute certain officers and other ranks to the integrated Divisional Headquarters, and it has also been suggested to the Canadian, Australian and New Zealand authorities that they might consider the possibility of contributing to the Divisional Signals.

7. In his letter of 8th December to the High Commissioner, the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs stated that, should a division of ground forces from Commonwealth countries ultimately be formed, the proposed title "First (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations Forces" would be acceptable to the Canadian Government.[49] This suggestion has also been agreed by the New Zealand and Indian Governments, and in the view of the United Kingdom Government this title should be given to the division at present proposed, subject to the agreement of the Unified Command.

8. The High Commissioner has been asked to ascertain as soon as possible whether the Canadian Government concurs in the formation of a division of Commonwealth troops and in the main outlines of its organisation as proposed above; and, if so, whether it would authorise the Canadian military liaison representatives in London to proceed at once to discuss with the War Office the detailed arrangements, for instance as regards finance and administration.

Note from Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner of United Kingdom

No. D-32 Ottawa, April 24, 1951

Top Secret

The Secretary of State for External Affairs presents his compliments to the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom in Canada and acknowledges the High Commissioner's note of April 6, 1951, concerning the possible formation of a Commonwealth Division in Korea. The proposals outlined in this note have now been examined by the Canadian Government, and it is understood that certain negotiations have been carried on between representatives of the Canadian General Staff and the War Office.

The Canadian Government has agreed that Canada should participate in the formation of a Commonwealth Division in Korea. It is intended that the Canadian contribution will consist of the 25th Canadian Infantry Brigade Group, of which part is now in Korea and the remainder en route to Korea, plus eight officers and fourteen other ranks for the Divisional Headquarters Staff. The Canadian Government is glad to accept the suggestion that the United Kingdom Government should make available a United Kingdom officer as Divisional Commander.

It is understood that further negotiations will be carried on between the War Office and the Canadian General Staff in order to complete the necessary administrative and financial arrangements.

A draft Directive has been prepared for Major-General Cassels, the Commander of the First (Commonwealth) Division in Korea, and has been approved by the Ministry of Defence on behalf of the United Kingdom Government. The text of the draft is annexed.

The High Commissioner has been asked to ascertain the views of the Canadian Government on the terms of this Directive and would be grateful if the Department of External Affairs could inform him of any amendments which the Canadian authorities might wish to make as early as possible.

The other Commonwealth Governments which are contributing to the division are similarly being asked for their views.

Projet d'une directive pour le major-général A.J.M. Cassels, commandant, Première Division (Commonwealth), Forces des Nations Unies en Corée

Draft Directive to Major-General A.J.M. Cassels, Commander, First (Commonwealth) Division, United Nations Forces in Korea

TOP SECRET

The role of the force under your command is as an integral part of the United Nations forces to act in operations designed to restore international peace and security in the area.

This force is composed of contingents contributed by the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and India. Contingents may be contributed by other Commonwealth countries in the future.

It has been agreed by the Governments who support the United Nations action in Korea that unified direction is essential to the speedy success of these operations. To this end the force under your command together with the units of the British Commonwealth Korean sub-area which are under the command of the Commander British Commonwealth Korean sub-area had been placed under the supreme command of the head of the United Nations Unified Command Korea, General Matthew B. Ridgway. You will carry out loyally any orders issued by him or by any American Commander subordinate to him under whose command you have been placed.

Lieutenant-General Sir Horace Robertson, Commander-in-Chief British Commonwealth Occupation Force, will act as the theatre commander for the purpose of non-operational control and general administration for all United Kingdom, Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and Indian forces in the Korea/Japan theatre. He will exercise this control through Administrative Headquarters British Commonwealth Forces Korea.

If an order given by the Head of the United Nations Unified Command Korea, or by any American Commander subordinate to him, under whose command you have been placed, appears in your opinion not to accord with the object of the United Nations operations in Korea as declared in paragraph 1 above, you will be at liberty to appeal to the Commander-in-Chief British Commonwealth Occupation Force, who will transmit your appeal to the Defence Committee, Melbourne, before the order is executed. You will however first inform the head of the United Nations Unified Command Korea, through any American Commander subordinate to him under whose command you have been placed, that you intend to appeal and you will give your reasons therefor.

If an order given by the head of the United Nations Unified Command Korea or by any American Commander subordinate to him, under whose command you have been placed, appears in your opinion to imperil the safety of the Commonwealth troops under your command to a degree exceptional in war, you will inform the head of the United Nations Unified Command Korea through any American Commander under whose command you will have been placed, that you will carry out the order but that you intend to report the circumstances and your reasons for your opinion to the Commander-in-Chief British Commonwealth Occupation Force for transmission to the Defence Committee, Melbourne, and you will take such action.

A report which may later be classified as "a despatch to be published" covering the operations of all Commonwealth forces under your command will be prepared by you for submission to the Defence Committee, Melbourne, through the Commander-in-Chief British Commonwealth Occupation Force, and the Head of the United Nations Unified Command Korea. You attention is drawn to Army Order 404 of 1920, a copy† of which is attached to this Directive.

Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee,

TOP SECRET Ottawa, July 6, 1951

Dear Mr. Reid:

The Minister has requested that I forward the Chiefs of Staff views on the matter of the draft Directive to the Commander of the First (Commonwealth) Division in Korea, in which he concurs.

In regard to the channel of communication to be used by General Cassels should he find himself in disagreement with orders issued to him for carrying out operations in Korea as shown in paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 of the Draft Directive, it appears to us at the outset that an effort is being made to use the same machinery for dealing with operational questions as was agreed to by the Canadian Chiefs of Staff insofar as non-operational control and general administration in Korea are concerned. It appears that any questions of disagreement on carrying out operational orders by General Cassels is a question of such wide magnitude that it could not be settled by the Defence Committee in Melbourne, in consultation with the accredited representatives of New Zealand and the United Kingdom in Melbourne. Any disagreement between General Ridgway and General Cassels on operations could only be settled by, at least, the Chiefs of Staff of the countries concerned, and quite likely would have to be referred to respective Governments, as it may involve an interpretation of the objects of United Nations operations in Korea.

Therefore, it is felt that we should make an observation that in our opinion these non-operational channels which were agreed to for this purpose are wholly unsuitable to deal with the cases mentioned in paragraphs 5, 6 and 7.

It appears to us that the channel for dealing with operational disputes should be to the Chiefs of Staff of the participating countries in the Commonwealth Division, and in our case I would suggest that General Robertson should be instructed to transmit any such information to the Canadian Chiefs of Staff, through our representative in Tokyo, Brigadier Fleury, for whatever action the Canadian authorities deem necessary.

The Chiefs of Staff feel that the likelihood of any misunderstanding arising with the personalities that are out there now is very remote, but there may be certain decisions in regard to occupation which may be highly political, therefore, it is essential that any decisions affecting Canadian troops should come through this channel.

Yours sincerely,
CHARLES FOULKES
Lieutenant-General

Memorandum

TOP SECRET Ottawa, July [n.d.], 1951

FIRST (COMMONWEALTH) DIVISION, UNITED NATIONS FORCES

The draft direction for Major-General Cassels, enclosed with the memorandum of June 22nd from the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom, is satisfactory to the Canadian Government except in one respect.

2. In the fifth, sixth, and seventh paragraphs it is stated that General Cassels will send certain communications to the Commander-in-Chief British Commonwealth Occupation Force (General Robertson) who will transmit them to the Defence Committee, Melbourne.

3. Presumably the Defence Committee, Melbourne, will, on receipt of such communications, consult the accredited representatives in Australia of the United Kingdom and New Zealand Chiefs of Staffs. However, the Canadian Chiefs of Staff have no representative in Australia; they do have a representative in Tokyo. He is Brigadier Fleury, Commander, Canadian Military Mission, Far East.

4. It will be recalled that a similar problem arose when the directive to General Robertson was considered in December, 1950. It was then decided to say that the responsibility for non-operational control of Commonwealth forces in Korea should rest with "the Australian defence machinery together with the accredited representatives of the Chiefs of Staff of all the participating Commonwealth countries. The accredited representatives of the United Kingdom and New Zealand Chiefs of Staff are located in Australia. The Canadian Military Liaison Officer at Tokyo has been designated as the accredited representative of the Canadian Chiefs of Staff in so far as non-operational control and general administration of the Canadian Army Force are concerned."[51]

5. The Canadian Government accordingly suggests the following changes in the draft directive to General Cassels:

[51] Voir/See Volume 16, Documents 95 and 96.

Fifth Paragraph Insert, after the words "who will transmit your appeal to the Defence Committee, Melbourne," the words "(and to the Canadian Military Mission in Tokyo),".

Sixth Paragraph Insert, after the words "Defence Committee, Melbourne," the words "(and to the Canadian Military Mission in Tokyo),".

Seventh Paragraph Insert, after the words "Defence Committee, Melbourne," the words "(and to the Canadian Military Mission in Tokyo),".

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: Yesterday I met the Deputies of the North Atlantic Council and made to them a short statement† which is being sent by airmail. It was very general in character, but seems to have been pretty well received.

2. In the morning I had a press conference as the journalists here, especially the Canadians, had been clamouring for some statement. The first question was on Malik's broadcast, and I expressed the view that while there were a great many ambiguities in the Soviet statement, and though we had had unhappy experiences in the past with certain Russian statements on issues of this kind, nevertheless it would be a great mistake not to follow up Mr. Malik's proposals, so that we could at least find out what they meant.[52] I added that if they contained a satisfactory basis for ending the Korean war, on terms which the United Nations could accept, then we should make the most of it. I referred to the "cease-fire" proposals of last December as constituting, at that time, such a satisfactory basis, and suggested that they should be re-examined.[53]

I am conferring with Mr. Morrison at 3:30 this afternoon, and will then go out to the airport to see Mr. Lie. I shall cable you if there is anything to report after that talk. Ends.

Following for the Prime Minister from Pearson, Begins: I had an interesting talk with Morrison yesterday afternoon, who I found well and cheerful, in spite of the difficulties that beset him at present.

2. He said that the government here felt that the Malik proposals should be treated seriously but cautiously; that we should avoid giving the U.S.S.R. any chance to say that they had been ignored or categorically rejected, and that they should be followed up at once, but with a minimum of publicity. He was hoping that Mr. Lie could remain in the background at present, because of the fact that he was so unacceptable to the Russians, and that subsequent enquiries of Malik might be made through Jebb and Austin and the French representative at the United Nations. I told him that this was our general attitude as well.

3. When I left Morrison I motored to the London Airport and spent a half an hour with Lie, who was enroute to New York. His general line was the same as Morrison's. He thinks Malik's proposals should be taken seriously, and that contact should be established with Malik at once for further clarification, but through the mechanism of individual enquiries rather than through the Political Committee of the United Nations or in any other public way. He himself does not intend to get in touch with Malik directly, for reasons which would appeal to Morrison, but hopes to use Zinchenko, who has apparently been closely in touch with him in regard to the Russian reaction to Korean developments.

4. On American advice, Lie has abandoned the idea which he discussed with me in Ottawa of a communication direct to Chou En-Lai, or even a journey to Peking, and has also, in view of the Malik proposals, decided it would be unwise to proceed with his suggestion that the Assembly might now be adjourned. I think that, in present circumstances, he is right on both these scores.

5. I suggested to Lie that in approaches to Malik, the cease-fire proposals of last December could be put forward, but that it might be unwise to put the Good Offices Committee or the Political Committee of the Assembly behind these proposals at present, as there might be more chance of success if a new departure were made. However, the proposals of last December for a cease-fire should suit the present situation if the U.S.S.R. is serious in its desire to bring the Korean conflict to an end. Lie is quite hopeful and thinks that important developments may be in the offing. I emphasized to him, though the emphasis did not seem to be necessary, that if so, these developments should be allowed to proceed normally and that we should be neither too impatient nor too obvious in following up Malik's suggestion. The thing is to work as effectively and as quickly as possible, but by confidential methods, if possible. Lie seemed entirely to agree with this. He added that the recent appeal that he had addressed to members of the United Nations for ground forces for Korea was badly timed in view of Malik's pronouncement, and he thought he might follow up this appeal by a personal and private letter to the Foreign Ministers of the governments concerned, asking them to postpone their reply to this appeal until the genuineness of Malik's proposals had been explored. Ends.

CEASE-FIRE IN KOREA

1. The usual State Department meeting this afternoon was concerned entirely with a discussion led by Mr. Rusk on the next steps to be taken in following up Malik's proposal for a cease-fire in Korea. The military situation remains substantially unchanged.

2. Rusk said that during the course of the day the administration had been considering what further action should be taken in view of Gromyko's clarification of Malik's proposal of June 23rd.[55] It had been decided that some move should be made to endeavour to ascertain whether the other side wished to take specific steps towards a cessation of hostilities. There had been no real definition of Peking's attitude, nor was it known whether the Communist commanders would be willing to meet the United Nations commander to discuss arrangements for a cease-fire on a purely military level. It was thought that the first thing to do would be to attempt to elicit some indication that the opposing commanders would be willing to undertake such a meeting.

3. The matter had been discussed with General Ridgway during the day, and Ridgway had just confirmed that he thought it would be practical to indicate to the opposing commanders his own willingness to meet them to discuss the possibilities of a cease-fire. General Ridgway had been authorized to address "by a number of means of communications" the following message to the Commander-in-Chief of the Communist Forces in Korea at 6:00 p.m., July 29th (8 a.m. Tokyo time) Text Begins:

Message to the Commander in Chief Communist Forces in Korea

As Commander in Chief of the United Nations command I have been instructed to communicate to you the following:

"I am informed that you may wish a meeting to discuss an armistice providing for the cessation of hostilities and all acts of armed force in Korea, with adequate guarantees for the maintenance of such armistice.

"Upon the receipt of word from you that such a meeting is desired I shall be prepared to name my representative. I would also at that time suggest a date at which he could meet with your representative. I propose that such a meeting could take place aboard a Danish hospital ship in Wonsan harbor.

M.B. RIDGWAY
General, United States Army
Commander in Chief
United Nations Command"

4. In explanation of the message Rusk said that it was considered important to follow up the initiative that the other side had taken, but not to give the impression that the enemy was considered to be suing for peace; in other words, care had been taken to avoid raising prestige obstacles which might prevent the enemy from responding. Furthermore, Ridgway's message would now place some responsibility for the continuation of peace efforts on the other side.

5. Ridgway used the title of Commander-in-Chief, United Nations Command, and made no reference to governments as such in his message, in an effort to accommodate the apparent desire of the other side to keep cease-fire conversation within a military framework and off the government level. On the other hand, it was necessary to make it quite clear that General Ridgway was speaking with full authority.

6. Mention had been made in Ridgway's message of the necessity for "adequate guarantees" because this was regarded as a sine qua non of any cease-fire arrangement. In the initial stage, agreements reached would not be inter-governmental agreements, but would be of a military character, and it would be necessary for each side to have safeguards against the surreptitious build-up of forces during the period of an armistice. (It was pointed out that Gromyko had referred to safeguards being discussed by the commanders in the field). The principle of supervision is of the utmost importance. The United Nations, for instance, could not be expected to withdraw from air activity without suitable guarantees against a military build-up by the opposing forces possibly through the use of observers.

7. A Danish hospital ship was suggested as a possible meeting place, with the thought that this would not require either side to go into the other's camp. The port at Wonsan was chosen, since this would be as convenient a location as any for the Communists. The hospital ship in question was the Jutlandia, which is already in Korean waters. It is understood that the Danish Government would be agreeable to the use of the hospital ship for this purpose. The ship would be operating under the control of the Danish Government, not of the United Nations command.

8. An anonymous address was to be used in Ridgway's message because there was no certain knowledge as to the identity of the opposing commander or commanders, nor was the relationship between the Korean and Chinese command known.

9. It is anticipated that if cease-fire discussions are held Ridgway will be assisted by a staff from the Unified Command Headquarters, including a senior representative of the South Korean command.

10. In the conduct of such discussions Ridgway would act under directives from Washington. There would be general consultations with the governments of countries having forces in Korea on such directives through their representatives in Washington. The report of the group on cease-fire in Korea, of January 2, 1951, to the General Assembly might be a useful starting point.[56] Discussions in the field by the military commanders would require some latitude and Rusk pointed out that a stage might be reached where Ridgway would have to act under immediate and most secret instructions.

11. Questioned as to the attitude of the South Korean government toward negotiations for a settlement, Rusk conceded that a very difficult problem was involved. He thought that it would be of assistance when the Korean Ambassador joined the regular meetings on Korea held at the State Department, since it was necessary that the Koreans should not feel that they were being entirely excluded from any settlement of the Korean affair. Rusk said that, although the South Korean Government would never abandon its stand on unification, nevertheless he personally felt that there would be limits to how far the South Koreans would wish to go to press their view. Ambassador Muccio was taking every occasion to point out to the South Korean Government that the unification of Korea was also a declared political aim of the United Nations.

12. In conclusion Rusk defined the United States position as being willing to accept an armistice, if satisfactory terms for a cease-fire can be arranged, because (1) the military aims of the United Nations armies in Korea have now been accomplished, and (2) it is the view of the United States Government that if the Korean war continues it will increase in scope, not lessen.

MR. MALIK'S PEACE PROPOSAL

Since Mr. Malik made his very brief offer on Saturday, we have been trying to get clear in our own minds what could be the possible motives for his action. This is an attempt to put that thinking down on paper; the result is unfortunately to pose questions but not to answer them. The matter can on the basis of the small amount of information available to us only be explored on a basis of alternatives.

2. The first series of alternatives is that either the offer was genuine or it was not. If it was genuine it would appear to follow that the Russians must have consulted the Central People's Government of China and that the latter must have consented to Mr. Malik's making the offer. This is a necessary deduction because the Russians would be in an impossible position if the offer was picked up and the Chinese refused to go along with Russian proposals. On the assumption, therefore, that the Chinese gave their consent to the offer and that the offer is meant to be a genuine one, again there are two possibilities. The terms of the offer were very brief and no conditions for a truce were specified. It is, therefore, not clear whether or not they intend to put conditions on the offer. If they do not intend to put conditions on the offer one is led to the assumption that they are ready for peace without necessarily obtaining their objects of a seat in the United Nations, control of Formosa and the destruction of Chiang Kai-Shek.

3. Seven reasons have occurred to us why the Chinese might be willing to agree to a truce without the attainment of their objectives. These seven reasons might be alternative or cumulative. They are:

(a) The Central People's Government may feel a need to be free to devote its full energies to strengthening its position inside China, i.e., to consolidate the revolution.

(b) The Central People's Government may see that it cannot win the war under present conditions. It apparently cannot get supplies from the Soviet Union in sufficient quantities to overcome allied technical superiority and, therefore, wants to call off the war and cut its losses. If this is an important factor, it follows that there is probably the germ of some unpleasantness here between China and the Soviet Union.

(c) The economic blockade (which of course began long before the United Nations passed its resolution) may be having a more serious effect than we have estimated.

(d) The Central People's Government may fear that a continuation of the war might provoke a naval blockade which in turn might have serious effects on the Chinese economy which the Central People's Government would be at a loss to counteract.

(e) The Central People's Government may fear that a continuation of the war will provoke a major war, accompanied by attacks on China. It may estimate that such a war would not be in its best interest at the present time and that the possible benefits to be gained from continued war in Korea will do little or nothing to compensate for the consequences of provoking a general war.

(f) The Central People's Government may have estimated that it would be worth considerable sacrifice to get United Nations (and especially United States) forces out of Asia in the belief that once out they would not return even under greater provocation than the original attack on South Korea a year ago.

(g) Consultations between the Chinese Communists and the Russian Communists may have led to the conclusion that it is in the interests of the world revolution to take steps which might abate the present rate of Western re-armament even at the sacrifice of principles and interests in Korea. While some Americans might be inclined to term this subservience to the Kremlin, it would be preferable to call it an identity of long-term interests.

4. We may find, however, that the Chinese are not planning on peace without the attainment of their objectives. They may think that by offering an armistice in Korea they can ultimately gain a seat in the United Nations, gain possession of Formosa, and destroy Chiang Kai-Shek. The Central People's Government may have estimated that a continuation of the present course, so far from making the attainment of its objects more likely is in fact making their attainment more remote. In short, it may have estimated that the time has come for a change of tactics without a change of objectives. It may think that, after the Korean war has ended, more countries will recognize the Central People's Government and consent to seating it in the United Nations. If this were to come about, the Formosan problem could come in front of the United Nations, as Mr. Acheson has said the United States wants it to, and the Central People's Government will stand some chance of either securing Formosa outright or at least of getting the Nationalist Government removed from it.

5. To go back to the original alternatives, it is possible that the offer made by Mr. Malik is not genuine. In this event, again two alternatives unfold. The offer can be made ineffective either by the Soviet side or by the United States side. Under the first of these alternatives, the Soviet Union or China may be planning to place impossible conditions on a settlement. This could have as its object injuring the morale of the allies (and especially of the European allies) by holding out the hope of peace and then letting their hopes down with a bang. The disadvantage of this course is that it might provoke strong United States reaction and possibly even lead to a third world war. On the other hand, it is possible that the Soviet Union and China may want war to break out now on terms which will make it look like the fault of the United States.

6. If the Soviet Union made the offer in the expectation that the United States would take action to make a settlement impossible it would necessarily be assuming that the United States would place impossible conditions on a truce. The object of this, obviously would again be to attack allied morale, to divide the Western alliance and to ensure that the Indians and other neutralist states would not take sides with the United States in the event of war.

7. While we may be uncertain as to the motives which lay behind Mr. Malik's offer, the Western powers would be negligent if they failed to try to take advantage of the offer. While this attempt is being made it will be particularly important to have any clues which may throw light on the reasons for the offer. It would be appreciated if such information could be forwarded by telegram.

TELEGRAM Ottawa, July 1, 1951

The following message delivered over Peking Radio Station at 13.30 GMT today was given Mr. Ignatieff by State Department and telephoned Ottawa. Message begins:

Here is important news from the Korean front:

A notification was issued jointly today after consultation by General Kim Il Sung, Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army, and General Peng Teh Huai, Commander of the Chinese volunteers in reply to the statement of General Ridgway, Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Forces.

The notification of General Kim Il Sung and General Peng Teh Huai reads as follows quote General Ridgway, Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Forces.

Your statement of June thirtieth this year concerning peace talks has been received. We are authorized to inform you that we agree to meet your representatives for conducting talks concerning cessation of military action and establishment of peace. We propose that the place of meeting be in the area of Kaesong on the 38th parallel. If you agree our representatives are prepared to meet your representative between July 10 and 15, 1951. (Signed) General Kim Il sung, Supreme Commander of the Korean People's Army and General Peng Teh Huai, Supreme Commander of the Chinese volunteers.

The above is unclassified, the following is confidential.

Comment of the State Department:

1. That General Ridgway's existing instructions would permit him to make a reply to this message accepting it.

2. That his only query might be the time of meeting. But it is left to his discretion whether to accept this time.

I asked Mr. Ignatieff whether the State Department had any views as to why date so far in advance is proposed. He stated that the State Department suggested two possibilities:

(1) The Chinese, Koreans, and Russians may not yet have agreed on armistice terms they will accept.

(2) Perhaps they were hoping to be able to strengthen their military situation meantime in order to be in a better bargaining position.

Mr. Ignatieff stated that the State Department seemed to be reasonably optimistic. He stated that the matter of instructions to Ridgway would be discussed at a meeting of representatives of participating countries to be held probably tomorrow. The basis of discussion would be the statement of armistice terms issued by UN Committee on January 2nd. He thought it would be useful to have our views by tomorrow morning. I am endeavouring to contact Mr. Claxton and Mr. Reid. Presumably we will have few comments if any on statement of January 2 which was then carefully considered by all governments concerned.

GUIDANCE FOR GENERAL RIDGWAY IN ARMISTICE TALKS

1. This part of the discussion in today's State Department meeting was led by Rusk. He began by commenting on the Communist reply to General Ridgway's first message and General Ridgway's message of acceptance of today. He said that the Communist message of July 1st (contained in WA-2699)[57] was drawn up in such precise and courteous terms that it seemed that the Communist Military Command was desirous of going ahead with talks leading to the cessation of hostilities. General Ridgway's reply of today was drafted on that assumption. The location of Kaesong was accepted by the Unified Command, with the difference, however, that General Ridgway's message specified "in Kaesong" while the Communist message had spoken of "in the area of Kaesong". General Ridgway also suggested a preliminary meeting between liaison officers on the 5th of July for the reason that a number of preliminary arrangements would have to be made to assure the security of the truce talks in a neutralized territory. This would be necessary in a front-line battle zone, but would not have been necessary had the Communists accepted a meeting on a hospital ship at Wonsan.

2. Rusk then outlined the broad principles of the guidance under which General Ridgway would conduct his discussions leading to an armistice.

3. Rusk said that the talks now contemplated between General Ridgway and the commanders of the North Korean and Chinese Communist forces, would be strictly military in character. What was contemplated were technical military arrangements for the cessation of hostilities with guarantees against their resumption, and the complete avoidance of any talks on territorial or political subjects. Rusk recalled that this separation of military from political discussions was in accordance with Soviet views as given in Gromyko's explanation to Kirk of Malik's statement. (See WA-2666 of June 27th)† Special arrangements, as Gromyko had suggested, would have to be made for political and territorial settlements. This, Rusk suggested, would imply a different forum for such negotiations with a different composition for the negotiators and terms of reference. It would also be understood that General Ridgway, for his part, would not enter into any commitments or agreements that would prejudice the United Nations principle of a unified Korea. Discussion of this question would be excluded from the military negotiations.

4. There could be no restriction on General Ridgway's military operation until agreements for an armistice had been worked out and put into effect. Rusk pointed out that the United Nations side was at a distinct disadvantage in regard to the capability to reinforce or replace its forces. The proximity of Manchurian bases, and of China as a source of manpower, made it possible for the other side to continue their build-up, which could obviously have an effect upon the relative bargaining powers of the two sides. Thus, for example, until agreements have been reached on an armistice it would be essential for the United Nations air operations to be continued. The cost of continuing military operations while the armistice talks were in progress would have to be accepted in order to maintain the present favourable military position of the United Nations forces. (Rusk suggested that it may be desirable to make some public statement in explanation of this aspect of the problem).

5. Details concerning any demilitarized zone should be left to the discretion of General Ridgway. It was not contemplated that there should be any significant change in the position of the armies under the armistice. It was important that the United Nations Command should maintain its present comparatively favourable military position until a settlement is reached in Korea. To give up the dominating ground at the base of the Chorwon-Kumwha-Pyongyang triangle would be very prejudicial to United Nations interests. (Rusk thought that the demarcation of a line would be the most difficult problem in the armistice negotiations).

6. Any armistice agreed upon should embrace air, ground and naval operations. If an armistice were concluded, air force activity would cease, and it was contemplated that United Nations naval units off North Korea would proceed into international waters outside the three-mile limit. The position of ground forces would be settled in accordance with any agreements reached as to a demilitarized zone.

7. Rusk reiterated that the United States was greatly concerned over the question of supervision. It would be absolutely necessary for the two sides to know what the other was doing during the armistice. It might be possible for the opposing commanders to establish a Mixed Military Commission, with officers appointed from both sides to have free access throughout Korea to supervise the observance of the armistice.

8. In short, from the remarks made by Rusk it appears that the United States Government envisages the talks now contemplated as being essentially concerned with comprehensive military arrangements for the cessation of hostilities and as being without prejudice to the character of the political settlement in Korea, which would have to be conducted in a different forum. When speaking after the meeting about the question of associating the United Nations with these negotiations, Hickerson expressed the view that after agreement had been concluded for an armistice it should be put immediately into effect. As soon as hostilities had ceased the agreement would be transmitted to the appropriate organs of the United Nations, presumably to be noted with approval. He thought that the Unified Command's existing authority would permit Ridgway to conclude an armistice without further United Nations authority. It would be an entirely different matter when questions of territorial or political settlement were under discussion. Specific United Nations authority would be required for the discussion of this category of questions.

9. The Korean Ambassador attended for the first time.

10. The comments of governments represented were invited on Rusk's statements. The next meeting will be on Friday, July 6th.

COMMENT ON RUSK'S STATEMENT

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: In paragraph 10 of your message you suggested that the comments of other governments represented were invited on Rusk's statements at the meeting held on July 3. I think there is no need to comment on what Rusk has said as the United States position, as both Mr. Acheson and Mr. Rusk have made clear, is that the United Nations Commander already has the power to conclude an armistice if he wishes to do so. This is a proposition which we do not wish to argue one way or another. The attitude of the United States government at this point appears to be most reasonable and we think that General Ridgway can be trusted to make the best possible bargain neither giving away anything unnecessarily nor pressing for so much that the negotiations will come to an end. This of course is based on the assumption that the enemy offer was seriously meant.

2. While we are content to leave the negotiation of the armistice in Ridgway's hands, it is of course understood that we will wish to make our views known on a political settlement in due course. As this position appears to be understood by the State Department, I think that it is unnecessary to offer any comment.

KOREA

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: In your EX-1519 of July 27th† you asked me to give an appreciation of the prospects and problems of the armistice negotiations. Such an appreciation can be little more than a summary of the main points in our reports of the meetings at the State Department.

2. On the whole, developments from Malik's speech on June 23rd to the agreement by the negotiators in Kaesong on the agenda for the discussions were mildly encouraging. Objections on the United Nations side to the presence of armed forces in Kaesong and to the denial of ready access to the conference site were met promptly and fully. The Communists also, as soon as they realized that they could not get their way, dropped their insistence on an agenda item dealing with the withdrawal of all foreign forces from Korea and substituted general language which was acceptable.

3. I think it likely that if agreement can be reached on the armistice line, it will mean that agreement on the other items will be forthcoming, though quite possibly after protracted negotiation. The case for fixing the southern boundary of the demilitarized zone at approximately the present position of the United Nations forces is unanswerable on military grounds. If the 38th parallel were to be accepted, the first defensive position to the south of it would be the Han River line, and Seoul would be extremely vulnerable if fighting broke out again. I have not heard any suggestion that other governments with forces in Korea would support withdrawal below the 38th parallel.

4. There is probably some room for bargaining in the position taken by the United Nations negotiators with respect both to the proposed southern limit for the Communist forces and the northern limit for the United Nations forces. The basic United Nations military position (the Kansas line) is several miles south of the proposed armistice line which in the main follows their advanced posts, and it does not include any territory across the Imjin River. The best early test of Communist intentions is likely to be whether they will accept any line other than the 38th parallel. If they do not, the negotiations will break down. The negotiators have been wholly deadlocked on this issue for half a dozen meetings, but that is the usual pattern in dealing with Communist delegates.

5. If agreement is reached on this, there is sure to be much argument over the next item, which deals with the means for ensuring the observance of the armistice, as inspection is rightly regarded as an essential condition to avoid build-ups and surprise attacks. During the debates on the agenda very little was said on this subject, and we therefore have not much to go on in assessing its difficulties.

6. The item on prisoners-of-war is also expected to prove troublesome. The Communists have already shown themselves very sensitive to suggestions that their camps might be visited by the International Red Cross. Possibly they would be less opposed to placing all arrangements relating to prisoners under the direction of one country, such as Sweden. I gather that on the United Nations side they intend to stick to the idea of a man-for-man exchange. There is no information in Washington on the numbers of South Korean prisoners held by the Communists, but it is thought that probably the United Nations side holds more North Koreans. Chinese prisoners in our hands and United Nations prisoners (other than Koreans) in Communist hands may be in rough balance.

7. If the negotiators work through the agenda successfully up to this point, the ambiguous fifth item on recommendations to governments may not prove very difficult. Agreement on the other items would establish, in my judgment, the intention of the Communists to go through with an armistice.

8. I think that there is little to criticize in the general line adopted by the United Nations command in the negotiations. Only if one felt wholly confident that a cease-fire would be promptly followed by an acceptable political settlement would concessions be justified on such matters as the use of the 38th parallel as the military demarcation line and loose arrangements for the observance of the armistice terms. There is certainly not enough reason for confidence to warrant acceptance of conditions which would gravely prejudice the safety of the United Nations forces if fighting were resumed. Ends.

7. Mr. Norman. Armistice talks have been deadlocked during the past week on the first substantive question on the agenda i.e., the fixing of a demarcation line and a demilitarized zone. The Communist Delegation has insisted on the 38th parallel as a dividing line with a ten mile demilitarized zone on either side; the United Nations Delegation has declared this to be a completely unacceptable basis for discussion. The United Nations Delegation has offered to consider a line other than the 38th parallel and adjustments in the demilitarized zone which it originally proposed but the Communist Delegation has not been receptive to this suggestion. The United Nations Delegation intends to wait out the deadlock on this issue and will not take the initiative in breaking off negotiations over it. (Secret)

KOREA — CEASE-FIRE TALKS

1. I should be grateful if you would see Mr. Hickerson or Mr. Rusk and give him orally and informally a message from me along the following lines.

2. While we are all greatly relieved here that the cease-fire talks have been resumed, we are also concerned by the possibility that the talks may break down over the issue of the demarcation line, and in such a way as to give the Communists good propaganda material.

3. It is my understanding that at the last cease-fire meeting, the Communists were still refusing to discuss the demarcation line on any other basis than the 38th parallel, and that they appeared either not to appreciate or else to be reluctant to respond to Admiral Joy's suggestion that the demilitarized zone proposed by the United Nations was susceptible of some adjustment. I realize that the United Nations bargaining position might be weakened if the United Nations now tell the Communists the precise compromise which the United Nations is willing to make. However, if the stalemate should reach the point at which there is imminent danger of a complete breakdown, I would think that the disadvantages of the United Nations volunteering a precise compromise would be less than the danger of the talks breaking down because the Communists had not realized that the United Nations was prepared to make this concession.

4. I am not myself entirely certain of the precise nature of the instruction which has been given to Admiral Joy in this regard. Am I correct in assuming that he has been authorized to make the proposal which Hickerson mentioned (your WA-3041 of August [sic])†: "the present battleline as the demarcation line with a shortened demilitarized zone less than 10 miles on either side."

5. I can myself see very considerable political merit in this kind of compromise proposal since it would mean that each side would withdraw its forces the same distance from the present battleline. I am sure that to most people this would seem an eminently reasonable offer and if the Communists refused it, it would be clear that the responsibility for a breakdown in the negotiations rested with them.

6. It is important, of course, not to weaken on matters of substance in the current Kaesong talks. But it is also important not to give either the Communists or the peoples in our own countries the impression that the cease-fire negotiations, so far as the United Nations is concerned, are on a take-it-or-leave-it basis. If the Communists were given this impression, there is danger that they would conclude that the United Nations has no real desire for a cease-fire. The Communist propaganda line at present is certainly building up towards making such a case. That case would be strengthened for them by the fact that they could compare our stand today as to where the cease-fire line should be with that which was put forward, with United States agreement, by the United Nations Cease-Fire Committee on December 15th last.

KOREA — CEASE-FIRE TALKS

1. The message contained in your EX-1607 of August 13th was discussed yesterday with Hickerson by Campbell.

2. Hickerson said he was quite in accord with your thinking and he wished you to be assured about this. The danger of the Communists making propaganda capital, if the present deadlock at Kaesong should result in breakdown of the cease-fire negotiations, is fully appreciated by the administration.

3. Hickerson read out portions of Ridgway's instructions, to show that the United Nations negotiator had latitude to make such a compromise as mentioned in paragraph 4 of your message. Ridgway's main limiting instruction is that he must not compromise the security of his forces, which means in effect that he must not compromise the "Kansas" line.[58] You will have seen from our WA-3100 of August 14th,† paragraph 5, that at the 23rd session of the armistice talks, Admiral Joy stated that he would be willing to discuss adjustments to the United Nations proposal for a demilitarized zone which could include changes in the demarcation line or changes in the boundaries of the proposed demilitarized zone.

4. Hickerson went on to say that he thought the time might come when it would be advisable for Ridgway to authorize Joy to make a compromise proposal (which might be an intermediate proposal or a final one). This however was a matter of conference tactics. The State Department, which has consulted the Pentagon on the question, does not think that the present is the proper time for presenting a compromise proposal.

[58] La Ligne du Kansas divisait la Corée au nord du 38e parallèle jusqu'à la rivière Imjin, qu'elle suit jusqu'à la mer.
The Kansas Line divided Korea north of the 38th parallel until it encountered the Imjin River, which it followed to the sea.

5. The adamant front of the Communist delegation has shown some slight sign of weakening, in that they have now at least been brought to discuss the United Nations proposal for demilitarized zone, even if critically. The State Department does not believe that the United Nations side should offer a specific compromise proposal at this time, when the first slight relaxation in the Communist position is beginning to show.

6. If the Kaesong Conference seemed in imminent danger of breaking down, Hickerson agreed that a compromise proposal should be made by the United Nations in an effort to avert collapse of negotiations. Hickerson believes, however, that there is not immediate danger of a breakdown. He asserted that the United Nations negotiators would certainly not terminate the discussions, if that could be avoided, and the State Department concurred in Ridgway's opinion that indications were that the Communists desire the talks to continue. Nam Il has not threatened to discontinue discussions if the Communist proposal is not accepted, but rather that there will be continued deadlock; Pyongyang broadcasts have also been in this vein.

7. Asked if Ridgway might in time present a compromise proposal, even if the Communists did not make the first move by abandoning their insistence on the 38th Parallel as the demarcation line, Hickerson replied in the affirmative. The United States, he said, would not wish to see the negotiations collapse over this issue.

8. It was revealed by Hickerson that the United States government had on August 13th sent a message of encouragement to Ridgway, commending the efforts of his negotiators in difficult circumstances and urging calmness, firmness and continued patience. The message was however critical of the "crisis atmosphere" generated by press reports issuing from Korea and Tokyo and it was requested that efforts be made to have these reports toned down.

9. Hickerson himself discussed the whole question of the Kaesong negotiations in a temperate manner and gave the impression that the attitude of the State Department in this matter is consonant with the message sent to General Ridgway enjoining patience.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures[59]

TOP SECRET [Ottawa], August 24, 1951

The Chargé d'Affaires in Washington reports in WA-3171 of August 21† that General Ridgway has urged the United States government to impress on governments with forces in Korea the value of making public statements in the near future supporting the Unified Command's contention that the 38th Parallel cannot be accepted as a basis for a demilitarized zone and that a militarily defensible line approximating the present battle line should be accepted by the enemy as a proper and reasonable basis for such a demilitarized zone.

2. You have no doubt seen the recent article by the Alsop brothers in which they suggest that the reason for the present difficulties over an armistice arises from the manner in which the talks were first suggested. They point out that Malik's offer fitted in well with Mr. Acheson's testimony, before the joint committees of the Senate, in which he appeared to support the idea of returning to the status quo ante bellum. This was a coincidence which we had already noticed in the Department. Between the time of Mr. Acheson's testimony, however, and the time when the truce talks were initiated, the United Nations forces in Korea made substantial gains north of the 38th Parallel and I think that it would be fair to say that we on the United Nations side have altered, however slightly, the basis on which we are willing to negotiate. That the United States itself has changed its point of view is proved by a footnote which appears in a publication of the Central Intelligence Agency approved July 5 ("Effects of Operations in Korea on the Internal Situation in Communist China") where the following words appear: "If the U.S.S.R. and Communist China do, in effect, desire a cease-fire along the 38th Parallel, they are probably motivated by considerations ... ." I think that this language is in itself evidence that the original intention of the United States in entering negotiations was to achieve a truce along the 38th Parallel rather than north of it.

3. As the Alsop brothers have pointed out, while the amount of territory involved is not large, if the Communists were to concede the present conditions of the negotiators of the Unified Command they would be accepting their first loss of territory since the end of the Second World War. This will certainly be a very difficult thing for them to do. It is a matter of debate whether statements in support of the position of the Unified Command by countries other than the United States would add anything to the bargaining position of Admiral Joy. There is no doubt, however, that a public statement on our part now, strongly supporting a demilitarized zone along the "Kansas Line", would tie our hands if, at a later date when the negotiations might seem to be on the verge of collapse, we wished to urge upon the United States a return to the original conditions which we all undoubtedly had in mind when Malik made his offer.[60] We might wish to urge a return to the 38th Parallel in a last attempt to keep the negotiations from collapse.

4. If you concur, therefore, I suggest that our best policy would be for the time being not to make a declaration such as General Ridgway desires and at the same time not to go out of our way to tell the State Department that we do not intend to make such declaration.[61] In short, I suggest that we should be glad to see the Unified Command achieve a settlement along the "Kansas Line" but that we should remain free to suggest a settlement on the 38th Parallel if necessary, even though such a line would be more difficult to defend. If he is pressed for a reply, we could instruct the Chargé d'Affaires to answer that no decision has yet been taken.

POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION IN KOREA

1. A meeting was held this morning at the invitation of the State Department for the purpose of explaining to representatives of the Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and South African Embassies the possible courses of action which were put by Mr. Acheson to Mr. Morrison on September 11th.[62] In the absence of Rusk his Deputy, Livingston Merchant, presided. He began by saying that the meeting had been suggested because in this restricted company fuller information could be given than in the larger regular meetings.

2. He said that, in the unlikely event that an armistice was achieved, the United States adhered to its earlier proposal that the next step should be a political conference to consider a settlement in Korea, which would only proceed to larger causes of tension in the Far East if agreement was reached on Korea. It now looked, however, as though the armistice negotiations would not be resumed, and it was therefore necessary for the governments chiefly concerned to consider what should be done in that event. Ridgway would not himself definitely break off the negotiations, but he was far from hopeful that they would be continued.

3. Spender made the point that if the present deadlock in the discussions continued without any exchanges marking a definite break, it was desirable to develop our views on the length of time which should elapse before the United Nations should consider that there was a de facto break and that the discussions were therefore at an end. The last message despatched on September 11th from the enemy command categorically rejected the suggestion for a change of location and repeated in extreme language the earlier charges of violation of the armistice zone. This crossed Ridgway's prompt apology for the one established instance of violation by a United Nations aircraft on September 10th; the apology was sent before a formal protest had been received. Merchant remarked that the Communist reply to this apology might give some evidence of their intentions. Ridgway is completely satisfied that there is no foundation whatever for the long series of earlier charges.

4. Merchant said that military evidence pointed to preparation for a large new Communist offensive. Far East Command estimated that supplies were now available in forward areas sufficient to maintain an offensive by 46 divisions for 26 days, compared with the stockpile before the April offensive of supplies for a two-week offensive. Two Chinese armoured divisions have been positively identified, and one North Korean armoured division has been tentatively identified. This is the first appearance of Chinese armour. They are equipped with T.34 tanks. The strength of the Chinese airforce is now put at 1,255 planes, of which 750, mostly MIG's, are in Manchuria.

5. On military grounds Ridgway has ruled out the possibility of a de facto ceasefire, on the ground that the security of his forces would be endangered by it in face of such a formidable enemy. If a breakdown in the negotiations is therefore recognized, it is considered essential that active United Nations operations should continue. Such a breakdown must also be regarded as indicating that the Soviet Government was prepared to incur greater risks.

6. The following counter measures were put to Mr. Morrison by Mr. Acheson as representing the views of the United States Government on the action to be taken when the negotiations are admitted to be broken off:

(a) Ridgway should be released from any restrictions imposed on his ground operations in the area between his present lines and the neck of Korea north of Pyongyang. If United Nations forces were to reach the neck, there would be consultation with the interested governments before they moved further north.

(b) The training and equipping of Korean units should be speeded up to provide some military reserves.

(c) The air force should be free to attack any air targets in North Korea, including the power installations and the Yalu dams, but no violation would be authorized of Manchurian airspace and existing instructions to stay clear of the Siberian frontier would be unchanged. In the event of massive air attack Ridgway's present orders still stood — that there should be no retaliation outside North Korea without prior authorization from Washington, which would only be given after consultation with other governments; the exception also still stands — that if there is a breakdown in communications Ridgway has authority to protect the safety of his forces in extreme circumstances.

(d) The development of the Japanese police reserve force, now numbering 75,000, should be expedited.

(e) Ridgway should promptly report to the United Nations on the breakdown of the armistice talks. The United Nations should then by resolution reaffirm its position on the aggression in Korea and efforts should be made to secure more troops from members of the United Nations. Furthermore, the United Nations should support a complete economic blockade of China (excluding Port Arthur and Dairen because of the Russian position there). The aim would be to bring about as complete a severance as possible of all commerce with China. I asked whether this meant naval enforcement. Merchant said that it might be agreed that governments unable to exercise effective control of their own shipping, e.g. Panama, would accept naval assistance in preventing ships flying their flag from entering Chinese ports. There would, however, be no naval interference with Soviet or satellite ships, and it was contemplated that the part of the navy would be limited to action against vessels trading in defiance of their own government's instructions.

7. Merchant did not comment on Mr. Morrison's reception of these proposals. We shall report separately on the British reaction, giving information provided by the British Embassy. In general the proposals strike me as being reasonable, except possibly for the economic blockade, which raises many thorny questions. I think it would be advisable to put to the State Department quickly any comments we may wish to offer on the proposals outlined by Merchant.

POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION IN KOREA
(INITIAL UNITED KINGDOM REACTIONS)

1. Later this morning some information on initial British reactions was given to us by Tomlinson, Counsellor on Far Eastern matters at the British Embassy, to the proposals of possible courses of action put forward by Mr. Acheson to Mr. Morrison on September 11. Unless otherwise indicated, the reactions reported were those of Mr. Morrison at this meeting.

2. Commenting on Mr. Acheson's proposals generally, Mr. Morrison said that they obviously contained some new thoughts and that he would have to consult his colleagues in the British Cabinet before making any commitments. He made the general observation, however, that it was necessary always to keep in mind that the potential dangers from Communist aggression were to be found not only in the Far East but in other areas of the world and that, the United Kingdom Government certainly did not desire to "get bogged down" in a war with Communist China, leaving the field open to Soviet trouble-making in other dangerous areas. He particularly referred to the opportunities for "troublemaking" open to the Soviet Union in the Middle East.

3. Taking up Mr. Acheson's point about a political conference to consider a settlement in Korea in the unlikely event that an armistice was achieved (see paragraph 2 of WA-3367), Mr. Morrison observed that while in the view of the United Kingdom Government such a conference would be desirable, the United Kingdom Government would attach great importance to the possible composition of such a conference. He emphasized that the United Kingdom Government would not favour a conference which would in effect confront the Communist Belligerents by a select group of Belligerents acting in the name of the United Nations on the other side. The United Kingdom Government would favour something more in the nature of a round table conference held under the auspices of the United Nations, recognizing the United Nations to be a universal body open for membership to Communist and non-Communist States alike.

4. The other specific points made by Mr. Morrison referred to the views of the United States Government on action to be taken when negotiations are admitted to be broken off, as set out in paragraph 6 of WA-3367 of September 13.

(a) As to 6(a) on the question of releasing Ridgway from restrictions imposed on ground operations in the area between his present lines and the neck of Korea north of Pyongyang, Mr. Morrison noted that the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff still believe that the best line of defence is the "Kansas" line but agree that Ridgway should be given leeway to make tactical advances up to the waist or neck of Korea. No advance beyond the neck of Korea north of Pyongyang, however, should be permitted to Ridgway without prior consultation between governments which have contributed forces to the United Nations command.

(b) As to 6(b), the United Kingdom agree that the training and equipping of Republic of Korea units should be speeded up.

(c) As to 6(c) on the question of permitting the air force to attack any air targets in North Korea, including the power installations and Yalu Dams, Mr. Morrison reserved the United Kingdom position. Tomlinson observed, however, that the United Kingdom Government would probably agree to this while stressing the importance of avoiding any violations of the Manchurian and Siberian frontiers. On the question of retaliation in the event of massive air attack, Tomlinson noted that the views of the United States Government as stated by Mr. Acheson did not appear to represent any change from the present agreed position on this point.

(d) As to 6(d) on the development of the Japanese reserve police force, Mr. Morrison observed that anything that might be regarded as a precipitate general rearming of Japan would give rise to political complexities and would have to be carefully considered. He admitted, however, the necessity of expediting the development of the police reserve force in limited numbers for purely home defence purposes. We took Mr. Morrison's reservation to apply to the three or four combat divisions which have been mentioned by the United States Government as a possible target in the re-establishment of a regular army.

(e) As regards 6(e), Mr. Morrison agreed that Ridgway should promptly report to the United Nations on the breakdown of the armistice talks, should this eventuality occur. The United Kingdom Government would see no objection to the United Nations reaffirming its position on aggression and urging members to supply more troops to the United Nations command. On the proposal however that the United Nations should be asked to support a complete economic blockade of China (excluding Port Arthur and Dairen), Mr. Morrison displayed "a marked lack of enthusiasm". He recalled that the United Kingdom Government had looked into the question thoroughly before and could not agree that there would be substantial advantages from trying to impose a complete economic blockade. Such efforts would not substantially affect the economy of China and would serve to cement further Sino-Russian relations. However, he undertook to report the United States views to the British Cabinet and to consider the question further. As to the question of naval enforcement, Tomlinson's understanding of the United States proposals are as given in 6(e) of my message under reference.

POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION IN KOREA

The following are my views on the proposals Mr. Acheson made to Mr. Morrison for dealing with the situation if the outcome of negotiations for a truce is adverse. I have taken into account the clarification contained in your message WA-3475 of Sept. 24.†

(a) Suggestion that General Ridgway should be released from any restrictions imposed on his ground operations in the area between the present battleline and the neck of Korea north of Pyongyang. The Canadian government would wish to take a position nearer to the United Kingdom's than to Mr. Acheson's. If General Ridgway is free to plan a strategic advance from the Kansas line to the northern neck of Korea, there are both military and political complications. On the military side as the UK Chiefs of Staff have pointed out, the present position is preferable because it is backed by the Kansas line of fortifications whereas any position seized near the neck would not have this strong line immediately behind it upon which the allied troops could fall back if need be. Communications are more difficult for the Chinese the farther south in the peninsula the fighting takes place. A planned advance to the neck would cause more casualties than action to hold the present line and rely upon aerial attack unless the advance followed a collapse of Chinese resistance. An advance to the neck would also increase the security problem facing the allies. The Chinese will suffer more casualties if they attack the allied forces in the neighbourhood of the Kansas line than if the allies should make an advance to the neck. On the political side, as soon as the allied forces had reached the northern neck they would again be presented with the problem of what to do next and this problem would arise before the enemy commanders would have had time to decide that continuation of the fighting is less profitable than a negotiated truce. The enemy political leaders would also be convinced that allied motives are less innocent than we say they are. On the other hand, in the absence of a negotiated truce providing for satisfactory machinery to ensure that the enemy are not merely building up for a new offensive, General Ridgway cannot well be denied the right to protect his forces by making short tactical advances. The sum total of these short advances might well, over a period of time, amount to a creeping advance to the neck of Korea, but in that case the enemy would have full opportunity to decide that a negotiated truce would be worth the price we ask.

(b) The Canadian government could have no objection to the suggestion for speeding up the training and equipping of South Korean units to provide military reserves.

(c) The proposal that the air forces be free to attack the Yalu dams and power stations is on the face of it a disagreeable one. The risk of extending the action to Chinese territory is extreme and the possibility of provoking Chinese retaliation against Japan cannot be discarded. On the other hand, it can be argued that to impose an embargo on all other strategic materials to China while leaving important electrical resources to flow into the country is illogical. It will in consequence probably be necessary for Canada to accept this United States proposal to take advantage of the opportunity of hampering Chinese industry in Manchuria.

(d) There can be no objection to the proposal to develop the Japanese police reserve provided it is understood that such development should not be forced upon the government of Japan and provided that it is understood, as it appears to be, that these forces should not be used in Korea.

(e) We readily accept the suggestion that if the negotiations are broken off General Ridgway should report that fact promptly and that the United Nations, if the majority so wish, should re-affirm their position on aggression in Korea. Partly because we would probably be unable to supply more troops at the present time and partly because it is desirable that some states in the United Nations should learn the responsibility attaching to their membership, we should wish to suggest that any plea for additional troops be addressed in the first instance to those states who have supported action in Korea but have so far failed to contribute troops. Such an appeal should be certainly precede an appeal for more men to the countries who have already provided troops. We share Mr. Morrison's doubts that there would be substantial advantages from trying to impose a complete economic embargo against China. Not only would this tend to make China more dependent upon the Soviet Union but in addition it places a further strain on the alliance formed by the countries resisting aggression in Korea. It helps still further to sub-divide this latter group by creating a category of countries which believe in strategic embargo but not in total embargo. The members of the alliance are placed in the position of having to oppose the United States openly or to knuckle under and accept United States domination as gracefully as they may. I am glad to learn that the United States is convinced of the impracticability of a naval blockade of the China coast. We should of course raise no objection to a system under which countries which are unable to enforce their own restrictions on their own ships can have countries with larger navies do this for them but we would not be willing to see a system set up which would allow the naval vessels of one ally to interfere with the merchant vessels of another ally without the consent of the latter.

2. There are two further points on which I should like to comment as a result of seeing the United Kingdom version of the Morrison-Acheson conversations. I noted that Mr. Morrison did not comment on the suggestion that the allied air forces in Korea should be free to bomb Rashin as necessary. As the air forces are in fact doing this at present in any case, and as General Ridgway has shown great moderation in his conduct of the war we hope to let this pass without comment. Secondly, as reported in the United Kingdom telegram† (paragraph 5(VIII)) there appears to be a difference in understanding between Mr. Acheson and ourselves about General Ridgway's instructions on bombing military targets in China. It is possible that this difference arises from an endeavour to keep the telegram as short as possible and that Mr. Acheson may in fact in his conversations have included all the reservations which we understand to be on General Ridgway's freedom in this respect. It is our understanding that General Ridgway is under instructions not to bomb bases in China or to follow enemy aircraft across the Chinese frontier without prior authorization from Washington. It is further our understanding that such authorization from Washington will be given only after consultation with the other countries having troops in Korea if time permits such consultation. We understand that if communications between Tokyo and Washington break down completely General Ridgway will be able to authorize such action on his own authority for the protection of the safety of his command.

3. In conveying these comments to the State Department you should endeavour to leave the impression that we have confidence in the intentions of the United States Administration and in General Ridgway's moderation and caution in his conduct of the action to resist aggression in Korea. The reason I have felt it necessary to make the foregoing restrictive comments is that unfortunately I cannot have the same confidence in the moderation of Congressional opinion. It may even be of some slight assistance to the Administration to be able to rely upon the opinion of its allies in trying to urge moderation upon Congress.

POSSIBLE COURSES OF ACTION IN KOREA

1. I passed on the contents of this message to Messrs. Rusk and Adams at the State Department yesterday afternoon.

2. Our discussion was chiefly concerned with the proposal that if the armistice talks break down General Ridgway should be freed from any restrictions on his ground operations as far north as the neck of Korea. Rusk said that he did not know what plans had been prepared by the United Nations Command, but he was sure that Ridgway was fully aware of the political and the military difficulties mentioned in your message, which would arise in case a strategic advance were undertaken to the neck of Korea. Rusk indeed mentioned several additional military difficulties: First, a general United Nations forward movement could not be undertaken without substantial reinforcements; secondly, if it succeeded, a United Nations air action against enemy communications would be gravely impeded through the shortening of the enemy lines; thirdly, if it succeeded, a United Nations communications would run through miles of difficult country methodically devastated for many months by our own bombing; fourthly, if it succeeded, the forward lines would be within easy operations range of jet fighters based in Manchuria.

3. He said that the central object of the United Nations Command continued to be to cripple the enemy forces, not to capture Korean real estate. If the enemy were to attempt, without success, another large offensive, this might be the best way of attaining the object. If they did not do so, the present tactical pattern of creeping United Nations advances, with the capture of one ridge making desirable the capture of the next ridge, would presumably continue. There might be also opportunities for amphibious operations, although anything on the scale of the Inchon landing would be out of the question without a large number of new troops. The idea is that the United Nations command should be free to operate up to the waist without political strings. When General Bradley and Bohlen return from Korea, we may be able to get additional information.

4. As to possible air action against the Yalu dams and power stations, Rusk pointed out that rail and road bridges over the Yalu have for long been a standard target, and the risk of inadvertent bombing on the wrong side of the river would not be greatly increased by adding as targets the dams and power houses. The restrictions on bombing close to the Soviet frontier are still in effect, although Rashin has been placed in bounds.

5. This led to a discussion of the marked increase in enemy air activity, which Mr. Acheson told me on Sunday was causing him great concern. Rusk said that the nature of the activity had not changed as yet, as it remained defensive in character and was designed to impede bombing of the road and rail communications in north-eastern Korea whereby supplies reach the enemy front. More enemy planes were now being used, and the jet battles with them extended further south than hitherto, centering more around Siniuju than Sinanju.

6. With regard to the current restrictions on Ridgway's air operations, Rusk confirmed that these conformed with the statement at the end of paragraph 2 of your EX-1884, with one addition which we have previously reported on several occasions. This is that Ridgway has authority, as a last resort to protect the safety of his command, to order retaliation outside Korean territory in the event of a massive air attack. He has orders, however, that he is to secure fresh authority from Washington if this is at all possible. Rusk commented that he was sure that Ridgway would do his best to consult Washington, and added that special arrangements had been laid on for instant consultation between the Defense and State Departments in event of a massive air attack, and also for consultation between the State Department and the embassies of countries with forces in Korea. The expanded enemy air activity naturally increases the concern that a "massive air attack" might be unleashed against United Nations ground forces, ships and communications as part of a new offensive.

7. With regard to United Nations action Rusk recognized the force of our argument that if an appeal were to be made for further troops it should in the first instance be addressed to co-operating governments which have not provided any forces. He confirmed that the proposal for tight restrictions on trade with China did not contemplate a naval blockade, but did contemplate the sort of policing action described in my WA-3474 of September 24th.† The general aim would be to tighten the screws on China by making it more difficult for ships to enter Chinese ports. He appeared to appreciate our argument that the imposition of a complete economic embargo might well add to the strains within the alliance against aggression in Korea.

8. As to the armistice negotiations, Rusk read me a message just received from Ridgway in which he said that he did not propose to insist that the site of the talks must be moved from Kaesong. If the enemy would not accept his suggestion to remove to another site a few miles away — a suggestion which has not been answered yet — he might propose that the negotiations should be renewed at any point between the lines which they might choose to designate. Ridgway remains determined to avoid responsibility for a definite break if one occurs.

SECRET [Ottawa], October 12, 1951

Attached is a copy of CRO telegram W No. 217 of October 3, 1951,† concerning the views of the Foreign Office on an article entitled "War and Peace in Korea" in the London Times of October 1.

2. The Times has argued among other things that "the best hope of success in the truce talks lies in the United Nations proclaiming its willingness to accept a political settlement based on the 38th parallel once the Communists have agreed to an armistice on the present military line". The Foreign Office is afraid that the article may be wrongly interpreted as representing the policy of the United Kingdom Government on Korea and it sets out what in fact is the real position of the government on this issue. On the particular point quoted it supports General Ridgway's insistence on the present battleline as the demarcation line between the opposing forces and says that this line "would then be retained as a temporary frontier between North and South Korea until a broad political settlement can be reached".

3. I think that the most important thing about this telegram for us is the clear indication it gives of the United Kingdom Government's full support for General Ridgway's present stand on the question of the cease-fire line. In view of the agreement of the United States and the United Kingdom on this issue it would seem only realistic for us to adopt the same attitude.[63]

THE KOREAN TRUCE TALKS

Following for the Minister from Reid, Begins: In telegram WA-3916 of November 7† (copy of which is leaving by air courier November 9), Wrong states that, because the large attendance at the State Department meetings on Korea may make it difficult for the United States officials to talk freely about the Kaesong dispute, he is thinking of arranging a private meeting shortly with Rusk, Hickerson, or some other appropriate officer, to discuss the present situation of the armistice talks but before doing so he would welcome our views.

2. The situation as reported in the most recent State Department meeting is that both sides are agreed on the width of the demilitarized zone and on the principle that the demarcation line should be based on the line of contact of the opposing forces. However, the Communists are demanding that the demarcation line should be based on the present line of contact whereas the United Nations negotiators argue that it should be based on the line of contact at the time of signing of an armistice. Recent Associated Press reports indicate the Communists may be weakening in their demand.

3. If they give in on this point the main question to be settled concerns possession of Kaesong. The United Nations' suggestion to place it in the demilitarized zone has been rejected by the Communists who continue to insist that the city must be controlled by them. United Nations side remains firmly opposed to this because of the military importance of the Kaesong area.

4. It seems to me that if Kaesong is the sole stumbling block the United Nations should give in, especially since nearly all the concessions hitherto on the cease-fire line have been made by the Communists.

5. You may wish to discuss this problem with the British and with Mr. Acheson before authorizing a reply to Wrong. Ends.

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: We are particularly interested in paragraph 8 of your teletype. We, of course, share the concern expressed at the meeting over the hitch which has developed in the matter of the demarcation line. We understand the anxiety of the Unified Command that a firm settlement now of the demarcation line might result in a lessening of military pressure upon the Communists to reach agreement on all items on the armistice agenda. We can also understand that the effects on the morale of the United Nations troops might be serious if any ground they gained from now on in the fighting would have to be given up once an armistice were concluded.

2. We are most interested in the fact that the Unified Command is now tentatively considering the possibility of proposing a time limit for discussing all other items of the agenda. We interpret this to mean that the Unified Command would propose to the Communists that if an armistice agreement is reached before the end of X days the demarcation line and the demilitarized zone would be based on the existing line of contact. It seems to us that this is a fruitful suggestion. It has very great political advantages and unless these advantages are outweighed by military disadvantages, we hope it can be pursued. You might tell Hickerson this.

KOREA — STATE DEPARTMENT MEETING OF NOVEMBER 13TH

1. There has been no change from the situation as outlined in our message WA-3951 of November 9th.† At the sub-delegation meetings held from the 9th to the 12th inclusive, both sides maintained their respective positions with regard to the determination of the military demarcation line. The United Nations sub-delegation's impression that the Communists would regard agreement on the location of the demarcation line now as a de facto cease fire is strengthened by the fact that part of the Communist suggestion is that liaison officers should proceed at once to mark out an agreed demarcation line in the field, while other items of the agenda are being discussed.

2. We informed Hickerson of the views expressed in your EX-2194 of November 13th and he appeared to be gratified. He said that serious consideration was being given to the possibility of making some new suggestion to break the impasse, such as that of a time limit for discussing all other items of the agenda. He confirmed your understanding that, if this were done, it would mean that the Unified Command would propose to the Communists that, if an armistice agreement is reached before the end of a certain number of days, the demarcation line and the demilitarized zone would be based on the existing line of contact. Hickerson said that, if the present deadlock continues, he would hope that there might be a development of this sort within the next day or so. He observed that the United Nations and Communist positions were sufficiently close that the Unified Command would expect to see continuance of efforts at progress towards an armistice, if there is any reasonable way of guarding against stalling by the Communists during the remainder of the negotiations.

2. Meantime, he has reported in his message WA-3951 of November 9,† which is going to you by bag, that the deadlock over the degree of definiteness with which the cease-fire line should be agreed upon continues. A Communist proposal to agree on a fixed line now subject to alteration at the time of signing the armistice was rejected by the United Nations negotiators because the Communists would have a veto over any proposed changes and would not be required to accept alterations no matter how reasonable those alterations might be. Hickerson referred again to the serious problem which the United Nations commanders would have with the morale of their men if United Nations troops should have to advance over ground which they now were committed to give up. He also said that the United Nations sub-delegation had the "impression" that it was implicit in the Communist proposal that there should be a cessation of fighting when the question of a demarcation line and a demilitarized zone had been agreed upon and before a settlement of other items on the agenda.

3. Replying to expressions of concern over the hitch which has developed in the matter of the demarcation line, Hickerson said that the Unified Command and the State Department have been giving serious thought to the problem and to what might be the way out. Since the Unified Command has anxiety that the firm settlement of the demarcation line and the demilitarized zone now might result in a lessening of military pressure upon the Communists to reach agreement on all items in the armistice agenda, a possibility now tentatively being considered is to propose a time limit for discussion of other items of the agenda.

4. The suggestion for a time limit seemed to present an equitable solution and I have, therefore, sent Wrong a message, the text of which is contained in my immediately following telegram.† Ends.

1. Following is text of the agreement on designating the cease-fire line concluded on November 23 by subdelegations Panmunjom:

Quote. 1. The principle is accepted that the actual line of contact between both sides (as determined under either paragraph two or three, as appropriate) will be made the military demarcation line and that at the time specified in the signed Armistice Agreement both sides will withdraw two kilometers from the line so as to establish the demilitarized zone for the duration of the military armistice.

2. If the Military Armistice Agreement is signed within 30 days after the two delegations approve in the plenary session this agreement and the specific location of the military demarcation line and demilitarized zone, determined by the subdelegations on the basis of the above stated principle and in accordance with the present line of contact as indicated in the attached map and explanatory notes, the military demarcation line and demilitarized zone shall not be changed, regardless of whatever changes may occur in the actual line of contact between both sides.

3. In view of the fact that hostilities will continue until the signing of the Armistice Agreement, if the Military Armistice Agreement is not signed within 30 days after the two delegations approve in the plenary session this agreement and the specific location of the military demarcation line and the demilitarized zone as determined in paragraph two above, the subdelegations shall revise, immediately prior to the signing of the Military Armistice Agreement, the above military demarcation line and the demilitarized zone in accordance with the changes which have occurred in the actual line of contact between both sides so that the revised military demarcation line will coincide exactly with the line of contact between both sides immediately prior to the signing of the Military Armistice Agreement and will constitute the military demarcation line for the duration of the military armistice. Please arrange to convey communication in following terms as soon as possible to Acheson, if available, or failing him, Lovett and Bradley.

2. I have discussed with my colleagues the suggestions made at our meeting in Rome on the evening of 28th November about the next steps in the Korean armistice talks. We are most grateful to Mr. Acheson and his colleagues for taking us into their confidence as they did and we are most anxious to keep in very close touch on this matter.

3. We think that the United Nations negotiators should continue to press for the most effective possible supervision arrangements. They might try for joint inspection teams at key points or failing this for supervision teams led by neutrals (e.g. Scandinavians). We realize however that it may prove impossible to get any satisfactory arrangements and that if the talks are not to be allowed to break down Ridgway may have to proceed on the assumption that the Communists are acting in good faith. In that event we agree that on conclusion of an armistice he should report back to the United Nations that it has not been possible to agree on what he considers adequate supervision arrangements, but that in order to bring hostilities to an end he has accepted arrangements, the effectiveness of which depend entirely on the bona fides of the other side.

4. We agree that in that event warning statements should be issued about the very serious consequences which would arise from a major breach of the armistice arrangements by the Communists. I do not consider that the warnings should be made only by the United States and United Kingdom nor do I think that a collective statement by the United Nations would be practicable. It seems to me that the statements should be made by the United States, United Kingdom and as many as possible of the countries contributing forces. These warning statements should be in very general terms and in our view should if possible be identical. It would be unwise to be precise about the nature of the counter action which we should feel obliged to take but we might for example say that in the event of such a major breach it might prove impossible to localise hostilities as hitherto. We should of course like to discuss the draft.

5. We agree that such a major breach of the armistice agreement would confront us with an entirely new situation which might well necessitate more drastic measures on the part of the United Nations forces but we do not think we should at this stage commit ourselves as to what precise measures should be taken.

6. Our preliminary views on the two measures mentioned by the Americans are:

(a) Naval blockade of China. China is not dependent to any real extent upon seaborne imports for the maintenance of her present war effort in Korea and in the short term this war effort could be maintained in the face of a sea blockade as a combination of the overland supplies from the U.S.S.R. and the production of China's own war industry. Admiralty do not feel that a sea blockade would produce effective results except over years rather than months. They also feel that unless the Soviet ports were included it would be futile. This last point has to my mind raised the gravest issue as it would be direct hostile (corrupt group) against the Soviet Union which is exactly what we are both so anxious to avoid. Therefore we are not at all convinced that a sea blockade would be a useful measure.

(b) Bombing north of the Yalu. Neither are our staffs sure that decisive results would follow from the bombing of the Chinese airfields and bases and junctions across the Yalu. However we would much rather proceed in this way than by the sea blockade. It is here to be noted that munitions sent through Soviet ports might be intercepted in this way.

7. We would like the United States and United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff to discuss these matters in detail between them and our people over with you are fully briefed on the details.

8. We are sending you shortly a note† on trade with China. Our information is somewhat different from yours.

9. I know you will understand that we must inform Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa of these exchanges. Ends.

My immediately preceding telegram.†
Following is text of Rome telegram No. 653 of 29th November, Begins: Following for Prime Minister from Secretary of State.

Mr. Acheson asked to see me this evening (November 28th) about Korea. The meeting was attended on his side by Lovett, Bradley and Pace and I was accompanied by the Secretary of State for Air, C.A.S., V.C.I.G.S. and Sir William Elliot.

2. Acheson said that since agreement had now been reached on Item 2 of the armistice negotiations (the line for the cease-fire) the negotiators would now have to deal with Item 3 (the question of supervision). On this the American view had originally been that they should hold out for a very strict and complete system of inspection. They had now reached the conclusion that there was little prospect of persuading the Communists to agree to supervision strict enough fully to safeguard the security of the United Nations forces. It was not in the character of a Communist regime to accept inspection on the scale which would be necessary. The Americans therefore considered that it might be necessary to reduce our demand in this respect and the security of the United Nations forces would then demand some other form of safeguard. They had in mind to make a statement if an armistice were agreed upon to the effect that a breach of that armistice by the Communist forces would be a very serious matter and would make impossible the localisation of the subsequent conflict. In Mr. Acheson's words we should make it clear that if the Communists broke the armistice "we should have to go after them". In Berlin we were secured against attack not by the forces at our command but by the knowledge that if our forces were attacked this would be regarded as an attack upon the North Atlantic Treaty Allies. In Korea if an armistice were agreed upon we should want to reduce our troops there. But having regard to the ability of the Chinese to reinforce in Manchuria and North Korea we could only do this if we could command an effective deterrent. If the arrangements for inspection were inadequate to guarantee us against a Communist build-up in North Korea we could only be safeguarded by a knowledge on the part of the Communists that "if they jump on us they will be for it".

3. General Bradley said that there were five possible degrees of inspection:

(a) Completely adequate inspection;

(b) Inspection by teams at key points of entry and rail centres;

(c) Area inspection by joint teams;

(d) Inspection within a limited area say twenty-five miles back from the demarcation (group undecypherable);

(e) Inspection within the demilitarised zone (four km. back from the line).

The last two would be quite inadequate since the Communists could build up an aggressive potential twenty-five miles back and without the present methods of interdiction they could develop effective rail communications and airfields in Korea for a powerful offensive thrust. Even with complete inspection facilities throughout North Korea our forces would not be safe for two reasons; first because an air threat could be developed north of the Yalu River and second because we could not demand that the rail communications in North Korea remain in the state of disruption to which our present air offensive had brought them. We had constantly forced the powerful Chinese offensive forces back on to their heels by our interdiction methods and once these were stopped there would be nothing to prevent them from building up a great offensive strength.

4. We were therefore faced with a choice of two courses. Either we must insist on the fullest measure of inspection (and even this as General Bradley had explained would not be 100 per cent effective) or we must admit that the Communists would never agree to such methods — if so we must adopt a policy of taking their good intentions to a certain extent on trust and let it be known that if they should violate the armistice "no holds would be barred". By this he had in mind a blockade of China and the bombing of bases in Manchuria and China.

5. In reply to my questions Lovett and Bradley repeated that it could not (repeat not) be part of the armistice terms that the Communists must refrain from repairing the rail communications and airfields in North Korea.

6. Mr. Acheson then said that General Ridgway should of course begin on Item 3 by trying to obtain the greatest possible measure of inspection. If he could get a degree of inspection which he regarded as adequate for the security of his forces well and good. If however he was obliged to retreat from this position (which he would certainly do slowly) he would want to know whether there was any alternative assurance of security. He ought to be given confidentially the assurance that it would be made plain to the Communists after the armistice had been concluded that treachery on their part would involve the serious consequences described above.

7. I asked whether it was suggested that these serious consequences would follow minor infringements of the armistice terms. Mr. Acheson replied this was certainly not his idea. The situation would arise only in case of "a major attack on the forces of the United Nations". General Bradley confirmed this. Nor did he mean that any announcement of this kind should be made while the armistice negotiations were in progress; all that was necessary in that period was that General Ridgway should know that he could accept a lesser degree of inspection than he would otherwise require because of the intention to issue (group undecypherable) warning which he had in mind.

8. In further discussion the Americans admitted that the need for a warning of this kind might continue for a very long time. On the other hand once an armistice was signed the likelihood would be that the danger of a violation would fade away. The longer the armistice was in force the more difficult politically would it be for the Communists to renew the war. General Bradley said that in his opinion the Communists would be unlikely to violate the armistice; they had suffered enough in the Korean war and he did not think they would want to begin fighting again at least until the disparity of force in the area had become a very great temptation. Mr. Acheson said that what was required was to make it clear to the Chinese that a renewal of fighting after the armistice this time would be far more serious than their incursion into the Korean war in 1950 and that it could in fact "be the trigger".

9. I asked what the Americans wanted us to do and how soon they wanted decisions from us. I assumed that the first thing needed was some guidance to General Ridgway as to how he should proceed if he was held up in the negotiations over supervision. They replied that this item would probably come up within the next two or three days and that there might be three or four days sparring round the subject after which the moment for decision would arrive. I said that I would talk the matter over with you and let Acheson have our views at the earliest possible moment. He thanked me and said that he was certainly not expecting an answer from me today.

10. In pursuing the matter further I said that it seemed to me there were three stages (a) the advice we should give confidentially to General Ridgway (b) the statement we should make after the armistice was concluded; and (c) the agreement we require to reach among ourselves as to precisely what measures we would contemplate taking in the event of the warning being ignored and an attack being made on our troops.

Mr. Acheson agreed. As regards the statement he thought that we ought to be able to find some formula based on what had been said in the case of Berlin i.e. that an attack on the United Nations forces in Korea would be regarded as an attack on the Nations participating. He was doubtful however whether it would be possible to bring the United Nations into it. Nor did he think that the statement should specify in any way what action would follow a breach of the armistice; it should rather be a general statement designed to make the Chinese Government and people conscious of the grave consequences of any treachery. There could be no time limitation placed upon it nor should it involve us in any unlimited future commitment.

11. As regards stage three the Americans repeated in reply to my questions that a blockade of China should be a part of the action. The number of ships entering Chinese ports had doubled in the past year and such measure would undoubtedly hit the Chinese very hard. I said that I doubted the wisdom and efficacy of such methods. The Americans added that bombing attacks beyond the Yalu would also undoubtedly be necessary. When asked whether this meant simply bombing the airfields from which Communist aircraft were now operating just north of the river the Americans said that it certainly meant much more than this. No mention was made of atomic attacks.

12. I thanked them for consulting us in this way and said that I assumed they would continue to consult us on the lines already agreed between us.

13. Mr. Acheson said he would be in Rome until Monday. I said that I would try to send the comments of His Majesty's Government on these matters on Friday. Ends.

Ends.

My immediately preceding telegram.
Following is text of Rome telegram No. 654 of 29th November, Begins: Following for Prime Minister from Secretary of State. Korea.

Conversation with Acheson, Lovett, Bradley and Pace recorded in my immediately preceding telegram has left me with following impressions.

2. The Americans want an armistice and are prepared, in order to get it, to accept arrangements for supervision which they fear will be unsatisfactory. But they feel bound to take precautions against infringement of the armistice in the form of a major attack by the Communists which they might not be able to foresee owing to inadequate supervision arrangements. Even so, like us, they doubt whether the Communists will break the armistice since they believe that the Chinese have had enough.

3. Finally the Americans left me in no doubt that the United States would rise in its wrath if there was a major attack. They clearly feel that the American administration could not hold the position against the clamour of public opinion.

4. I promised Acheson that I would let him and his colleagues know our considered views as soon as possible. What they seek is to assure Ridgway that if he cannot get satisfactory terms on supervision he is to work for an armistice nonetheless keeping at the back of his mind that if the Communists broke the armistice by a major attack drastic measures against China would be taken. We also need to give United States Government in the near future our reaction to the proposal that immediately after the conclusion of an armistice there should be an announcement in general terms of the serious consequences which must flow from a major infringement.

5. Meantime I suggest that Chiefs of Staff might be instructed to examine and report (a) on the actions that would be desirable (if the occasion should arise) against the Communist air force and their bases north of the Yalu and (b) on the implications of naval blockade. Ends.

KOREA

I have read these with much interest and some anxiety. Mr. Eden had told us in Rome that Acheson had talked to him about Korea along the lines of the Commonwealth Relations Office messages. I was somewhat worried, after a talk Eden had had with Heeney about the meeting, lest Acheson felt that in talking to Eden he was passing on the information in question not only to the United Kingdom but the Commonwealth. I was also somewhat surprised that Acheson, in discussing Korean matters, which are of especial interest to Canada, did not include us in the discussion so that we could get the United States views first-hand. I think it would be desirable that our Ambassador in Washington should let the Americans know that we expect direct consultation on a matter of this kind, which is of such immediate importance to us. Otherwise, we may find that the United Kingdom and the United States have agreed on a course of action, and even on a form of announcement, which we will be asked to accept unaltered; or without sufficient time to make our views known.

2. The issues involved in the proposed United States procedure are, of course, very far-reaching, and deserve the most careful consideration by every government concerned. I am not now commenting on the American suggestions themselves, but am merely indicating my anxiety lest, in the absence of direct information from Washington, we may be confronted with decisions reached in London and Washington and which we will be expected to accept unaltered.

3. It may well be, of course, that Acheson expects the United Kingdom to take these matters up with other Commonwealth countries. But this, of course, is not nearly so satisfactory as direct discussions both with Washington and London, and I think that Washington should be informed of that fact.

4. I will, of course, have a chance to talk about these matters with Eden and Ismay when I reach London. Meanwhile, I thought you should have my preliminary reaction to the messages in question.

KOREA

I suggest that something along the following lines be sent immediately to Wrong for purposes of discussion with the State Department. It represents my preliminary thoughts on the problem raised by Mr. Acheson in Rome. While our views should be made known to the Americans, it might be left to Wrong's discretion as to how he presents them, Begins:

2. I realize that the formula which the United States is seeking to meet any serious breach of the armistice, is important. The United States willingness to allow Ridgway to accept less than 100 percent inspection is commendable and realistic. I am somewhat encouraged in addition by Bradley's assessment that the Communists may have had enough. My worry is, however, that insufficient attention may be given to the possibility of a major war in the desire to bring about a speedy armistice without insisting on adequate inspection.

3. It is not too clear from the telegrams we have received whether General Ridgway would be given freedom to reopen unlimited hostilities only if the Communists made a major attack on United Nations forces or whether he would be free to do so if the build-up of Chinese forces behind the lines were sufficiently dangerous in his opinion to jeopardize his military position. You might seek clarification on this.

4. I agree that the immediate problem seems to break down into the stages suggested by Mr. Eden in paragraph 10 of telegram No. 96 of December 1st (EX-2309 to Washington). The first stage, instructions to General Ridgway, will set the pattern for what follows. For that reason, some use should be made of the arrangements which exist in Washington for liaison with governments which have troops in Korea. The necessity of immediate instructions is obvious, but the time element scarcely counterbalances the gravity of the decision to be taken. My preliminary thought on the specific question of inspection is that every effort should be made to get the Communists at least to accept inspection teams led by bona fide "neutrals". Representatives of the Scandinavian countries or of India might be acceptable.

5. The second stage, the declaration to be made at the conclusion of the armistice, offers difficulties of both form and substance. I am not clear whether the United States envisages a single United States declaration, a United States-United Kingdom declaration, or a United States-Commonwealth declaration. I am not convinced, in spite of what appears to be the United States view, that the United Nations could not be associated more directly with some such declaration. I see merit in the United Kingdom suggestion contained in paragraph 3 of telegram No. 95 of December 2 (EX-2308 to Washington). Such a report by Ridgway might lead to the adoption of a resolution by the General Assembly, noting with satisfaction the report and agreeing that any breach of the armistice would involve very serious consequences for those responsible for such a breach. It seems highly desirable to associate the United Nations with the settlement phase of the Korean war, when such an effort has always been made to associate it with the action in Korea. I attach as you know great importance to maintaining the United Nations character of the operations in Korea.

6. In considering the idea of a declaration along the lines suggested by the United States, I am not completely convinced that it would be the best way to achieve what is required. It makes sense to leave the Chinese in no doubt as to the consequences of a breach of the armistice. Yet such a formal statement as I gather the United States would wish to make may be unnecessarily (provoking?) an already high-developed Chinese sensitivity. It seems to me worth examining the possibility of making the point just as effectively to the Chinese military representatives in the course of the discussions. Such a point would certainly get to the press of the world, and if the suggestion contained in paragraph 5 above could be implemented, the main purpose would be achieved. I am certainly anxious to avoid the necessity of Canada making an individual statement of the type under consideration.

7. I believe we might support the United Kingdom view as to the inefficacy of naval blockade. I am further of the opinion the bombing beyond the Yalu is itself no magic device to bring the Chinese to terms. In considering specific measures, however, I would wish to have a good deal of clarification of the implication in paragraph 11 of telegram No. 96 of December 1 (EX-2309 to Washington) that bombing beyond the Yalu would be but the opening move in carrying the war to Continental China.

8. You will realize our interest in obtaining as soon as possible a first-hand account of United States views on these questions from United States officials. If this can be secured before I reach London on Thursday, December 6, so much the better.

KOREA

Following for Minister from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: Your telegrams under reference have been relayed to Washington for the action of the Ambassador. In making the following observations my purpose is to develop our own thinking on a number of problems rather than to provide specific questions which Mr. Wrong might ask the State Department.

2. There are some points which are raised in paragraph 3 of your message 130 which are not fully met in paragraph 7 of telegram Y. No. 664 (repeated to you as my No. 96). The point as we see it is not only the distinction between a major and minor infringement of armistice terms, a point on which Mr. Acheson reassured Mr. Eden, but also whether the United States military might not consider that a massive and challenging build-up on the part of the enemy would justify action which would, if postponed, expose U.N. forces to greater hazards when the enemy finally launches his attack. In the event of a violation of the armistice terms, while the U.N. command in Korea will naturally be fully aware of an attack, there might be a practical problem as to what body, if any, should be set up to judge the nature and extent of any violation. Not only will the inspection teams be confined to specific localities but they might not be in an area where they could be a witness to an enemy attack. Even if there were "neutral" inspection teams which might also be charged with the responsibility for judging the nature of armistice violations, would the U.S., for example, feel that their decision should be binding and final? Alternately, would it be desirable to create a U.N. commission specifically for the purpose of acting as a watch-dog over the armistice terms?

3. The proposal for a declaration as discussed in paragraph 5 of your No. 130 raises a number of problems:

(1) A declaration made solely by the U.S. Government. This seems to raise serious objections. It will provide the Communist world with an attractive propaganda target in that they can argue that here at last is clearly shown the U.S. monopoly in the Korean operation.

(2) A declaration by the U.S. and a number of Commonwealth governments. This also would be undesirable as it would ignore a number of effective allies in the Korean struggle; further it would be impossible to get Commonwealth unanimity, and hence it might end up with only non-Asian members of the Commonwealth subscribing, thereby again providing propaganda ammunition.

(3) A declaration by those governments with troops in Korea. This would strengthen what I believe to be a dangerous tendency to perpetuate within the U.N. a distinction between those governments which not only vote against aggression but are expected to bear the burden of implementation and those which merely vote.

(4) A declaration by all U.N. governments which have voted in support of the U.N. action in Korea. The objection to this is that the influence of a number of countries which have not as direct a stake in the issue as others, and which therefore might act irresponsibly would come into play. Moreover, in order to achieve anything like unanimity, such a declaration might have to be so carefully tailored that it would not resemble the original design fashioned by the sponsoring governments. It thus seems to me that no combination of governments within the U.N. provides a happy grouping to be the signatories of such a declaration.

4. I agree that we would wish to have clarification of paragraph 11 of telegram Y. No. 664 as requested in your paragraph 7. I am fully aware of course that it will be difficult for Mr. Wrong to secure authoritative commentaries on this paragraph by consulting the State Department, particularly in the absence of Mr. Acheson. We are entitled, however, to explore in our own thinking what might be the meaning of such language as "no holds barred". My impression is that this definitely envisages the fullest possible use of the dreadful panoply of modern war. Although the U.S. officials did not mention the use of atomic weapons against China to Mr. Eden, neither did they rule it out. While I am somewhat puzzled as to why the British would prefer, for example, the bombing of Manchuria to a naval blockade of China, it seems clear that the answer to this lies not so much in what type of attack on China is most effective from a military point of view as an estimate of what actions, e.g., naval blockade or air attacks on bases and lines of communications in Manchuria, would be more likely than others to bring the U.S.S.R. fully into the war.

5. From these preliminary views you will see that I feel, at the present at least, that there appear to be serious objections to a declaration such as that contemplated by the U.S. There remains the possibility raised by you in your paragraph 6 of injecting the substance of such a declaration into the cease-fire talks with the expectation that it would very soon be made public through the world press. This would have to be done most skilfully to avoid giving the other side what might appear a good pretence to break off the talks or to utilize the statement for effective propaganda purposes. It has the advantage, however, that since it will not be given as a public declaration with all the consequent obligations, it will not tie the hands of governments subscribing to it and thereby tend to make their policy rigid and inflexible.

6. On this point we think that the analogy between the proposed declaration on Korea and the one on Germany which has already been made is dangerous. Germany is of such extreme importance strategically that we are right to threaten a general war if Western Germany is attacked. Korea is of such minor importance, strategically, that it might well be unwise to promise in advance that if Southern Korea is attacked we would conduct a general war against China regardless of the strategic situation which might exist in other parts of the world at the time of the attack. We should also keep in mind the point which Mr. Schuman made in Rome that a guarantee to Southern Korea might conceivably be interpreted by the Chinese Communists as a signal that it would be safe for them to go ahead in Indo China.

7. While on the whole, therefore, I am sceptical of the wisdom of the proposed declaration, I feel I should mention some points in its favour. First, it may be a convenient device by which the U.S. Administration can sell the armistice more effectively to the U.S. public and, at the same time, muzzle the opposition which will be always ready to cry appeasement. It will also make it easier for those governments with troops in Korea to proceed with withdrawal at a comparatively early stage.

8. Since we were first informed of the U.S. views on this matter by the U.K. High Commissioner's Office here, I trust that you would have no objection if we keep them informed of our thinking on the whole question.

1. I have discussed the substance of the Minister's telegram 130 from Paris with Hickerson, who is the senior officer now at the State Department working on the armistice negotiations. His comments follow on each paragraph using the same paragraph numbers.

2. He pointed out that there can be no such thing as one hundred percent inspection even if the full United Nations military desiderata were met by the Communists. The most obvious illustration is that the armistice can in no way prevent or limit Communist ground and air build-up in Manchuria, and also that it would be impossible with the most complete inspection we could contemplate to prevent substantial infiltration of men and supplies across the Yalu.

3. He assured me, as indeed seems evident from paragraph 7 of Mr. Eden's report repeated in your EX-2309 of December 1st, that the present proposals related only to the action to be taken in the event of a major attack on United Nations forces. He added that if during the armistice there was convincing evidence through build-up in Manchuria (or indeed in Korea) that an attack was imminent, counter measures might have to be taken, but this possibility was not included in the current negotiations.

4. The State Department is not willing at this stage to bring up the questions at issue at the regular meetings of representatives of governments with forces in Korea for fear of a leak. They would also later on not be prepared to discuss in that forum the military measures which might be taken in the event of an attack, although they are prepared to discuss a warning declaration. During the last two days the situation about neutral observers has changed, and it is reported today that the Communists have suggested as possible countries of origin Czechoslovakia, Poland, Switzerland, Sweden and Denmark.

5. The State Department has in mind that the declaration on conclusion of the armistice should preferably be made collectively by the sixteen countries with combatant troops in Korea, and the United States Ambassador in London was instructed last night so to inform Mr. Eden. They favour the association in some way or other of the United Nations with a declaration on these lines, but believe that the initiative must be taken by the sixteen countries. They think that Ridgway's report on the conclusion of an armistice should go both to the General Assembly and to the Security Council, and that the Assembly at least might in receiving it endorse the substance of the declaration on consequences of a breach. They realize that to secure without elaborate negotiations an agreed text of the declaration even among the sixteen countries will mean that it must be concise and general in its terms. There is thus no difference between their view and ours of the desirability of associating the United Nations, and they are giving thought to the best means of doing it.

6. Hickerson sees difficulties in the way of giving a general warning to the Chinese and North Koreans only in the course of the armistice discussions. This would lack the weight of a joint declaration by the governments concerned and would also introduced an element of chance in the publicity it would receive. I emphasized that Mr. Pearson would be anxious to avoid making a separate statement of this sort on behalf of the Canadian Government.

7. Hickerson commented that a major attack in violation of the armistice would in effect constitute a new war. It is impossible to agree in advance on the extent of the military action that might have to be taken by the United Nations forces, as the prime necessity would be to protect their security. All that can be discussed at this stage is the initial action following such an attack. The United States government continues to favour both bombing beyond the Yalu and a naval blockade. (I think that Hickerson himself has doubts about the value of the naval blockade, at any rate as an initial step.) As to air action, what they have in mind here is attacking Chinese air bases wherever this would be most likely to damage their use of air power and also communications and supply depots. They are seeking agreement with the United Kingdom now only on the minimum steps initially required.

8. With reference to Mr. Pearson's message No. 126 of December 3rd repeated in your EX-2322, the position as stated by Hickerson is that they feel it necessary to work out a general understanding with the United Kingdom before taking into their confidence all the other countries with combat forces in Korea. He readily assured me, however, that the State Department would keep the Embassy directly informed of developments. Certainly Mr. Acheson did not consider that Canada was being indirectly consulted as a result of his discussion with Mr. Eden in Rome. Indeed, they are mildly plaintive here that the British promptly informed "the old Dominions", although they are quite ready to give Canada special treatment. They wish to keep the discussions at present on a very secret basis until they are sufficiently advanced to bring in the French in particular and others as well. They will not, however, discuss with all the countries with forces in Korea possible future operations in the event of a breach of an armistice for fear of dangerous leaks.

9. I shall send further comments tomorrow.

KOREA

Mr. Pearson and two members of the delegation had an hour's talk last evening with Gross and Ross of the United States delegation on the subject of Korea. Attention was given to both the immediate problem of negotiations in Korea and action in the United Nations in the post-armistice period. It was an informal talk and Mr. Pearson advanced a number of ideas especially as to future action in the United Nations with respect to Korea. An attempt has been made below to set out in some logical sequence the main points made in the conversation. It will be appreciated that the conversation did not proceed in this orderly fashion and that no attempt was made to exhaust the possibilities of any single suggestion.

Present Negotiations in Korea

2. The Minister made it clear that Mr. Acheson's consultations with Mr. Eden in Rome were not to be thought of as adequate consultation with ourselves or other members of the Commonwealth and said that we were consulting the State Department through Wrong. Gross seemed to appreciate the point. Some of the suggestions made in our telegram under reference were repeated to Gross and special emphasis was laid on the idea that every attempt should be made to have any declaration along the proposed lines made within the framework of the United Nations insofar as that was possible. We got the general impression that United States thinking on the proposed declaration was neither as firm or as extreme as was at first suggested in Mr. Eden's telegrams.

3. We agreed that every effort should be made to achieve inspection procedures as satisfactory as possible to the Unified Command. Whatever these procedures might be, it was agreed that some warning of the consequences of a major breach of the armistice would have to be given to the Chinese. However, Mr. Pearson argued that any such declaration should not spell out the specific consequences of a breach but rather should be general in character. He urged the good sense of making the declaration here and the further value of its being contained in a General Assembly resolution. There was no opposition offered to the suggestion nor was there any expression of warm agreement by Gross. In answer to specific questioning, Gross left us with the impression that the United States does not envisage admitting any discussion of the future of Korea or of the political problems of the Far East under Item 5 (Recommendations to Governments) of the immediate agenda in Korea. In his opinion such a development would reintroduce the old controversy (on which in his opinion our side had now won its point) as to whether a cease-fire should precede or follow negotiations on the future status of Korea and related Far Eastern problems.

Action in the United Nations

4. Gross made it a point to tell us that he had obtained specific clearance from Washington to talk on this subject with Mr. Pearson before the latter's departure from Paris. He said he had not discussed the question with any other delegations, including the United Kingdom on French delegations. After this introduction, the substance of his remarks was somewhat disappointing, although an opportunity was afforded for Mr. Pearson to make a number of informal suggestions as to possible future courses of action.

5. Gross said that United States views on action in the United Nations in the post-armistice period were not yet firm and that the State Department and the Pentagon were discussing the problem as a matter with urgent priority. We understood from his words, however, that the United States considered a thorough airing of the subject in the United Nations to be desirable. The United States envisaged a report by Ridgway to the Security Council along the lines already familiar to us; i.e., a report indicating that in the interests of achieving an armistice the Unified Command had accepted inspection procedures which were not completely satisfactory to it. An anodyne resolution might then be introduced which would merely note the report with satisfaction. There was some division of opinion within the State Department as to whether such a resolution should reaffirm earlier Security Council and General Assembly resolutions on the subject of Korea. Gross believed that, in the interests of preventing a Soviet veto, reference to these earlier resolutions might be omitted. He thought this view might prevail.

6. There could be no question of the Security Council in this resolution relinquishing its interest in the subject, nor should the resolution have anything to say concerning the future of the Unified Command. (This approach is similar to that which was discussed in parallel informal Commonwealth talks which are being reported separately.) A second resolution might be introduced in the Security Council which would transfer consideration of the post-armistice settlement in Korea to the General Assembly. Gross believed that if the Soviet Union was interested in stopping the fighting in Korea it might not use its veto to prevent the passage of such a resolution. Gross was of the opinion that the discussion of the present Korean item should be delayed for the time being, and in addition that some decision should be taken to prevent discussion of Korea (at present it would be discussed not only under Item 17 but also under Item 67, the Soviet item on the agenda) until a cease-fire agreement had been reached in Korea.

7. It was apparent that beyond this point, United States thinking is not firm, and Gross was anxious to have Mr. Pearson's views. From what Gross said, it seemed likely, however, that the United States:

(a) Would be unwilling to agree to any machinery which would involve a conference of spokesmen of governments in formal session, since this would raise not only the United States problem with respect to the Communist Chinese Government but also the problems of the position of the R.O.K. Government, the North Korean Government, and the Chinese Nationalist Government;

(b) Would find it difficult, if there were to be a mediator, to entrust the role to any non-American;

(c) Considered it important to have all the Big Four powers on any commission which might be established;

(d) Would not regard the prolongation of negotiations over a long period with any concern;

(e) Would insist that any General Assembly resolution which might be passed concerning the future political settlement in Korea should reaffirm the important resolutions on Korea which had already been passed;

(f) Would be wary of the concept of "neutrals" in the function of any future United Nations negotiations with the Communists, (and similarly in the composition of inspection teams) since there are theoretically no neutrals in the United Nations insofar as the Korean issue is concerned.

8. The discussion then centered on the type of machinery which might be most acceptable and effective. Gross suggested four possibilities. They did not seem to us to be mutually exclusive, nor did Gross explain in any detail the essential differences among them or the priority assigned in his thinking to them. They were:

(a) A commission with advisory functions either as a separate organization or linked with a United Nations mediator;

(b) A commission with good offices functions;

(c) A negotiating commission;

(d) A single United Nations mediator.

9. Mr. Pearson offered several more concrete suggestions for consideration. He stressed first the importance of the quality of the members of any United Nations Commission which might be set up, and the desirability of its being a small body. A three-man commission with the United States, the USSR, and one competent member, who might perhaps be an Indian, would have the advantage of small size but would put tremendous pressure on the third member. A five-power group might reduce this pressure if it were to consist of the United States, the USSR, two friendly but responsible members, possibly representing governments with troops in Korea, and one "free-wheeler". The Minister thought some consideration might be given to the desirability of not including the United Kingdom or France, since the great-power nature of the group might lead to additional difficulties. Finally, he examined the possibility of a United Nations mediator, chosen with great care as a man of experience, tact, and patience who might report to a commission of undetermined size. The work of Bunche in Palestine or Graham in Kashmir might be considered as examples. It would be clear that the mediator would have to go not only to Korea but also to Peking. The commission to which the mediator would report might sit in New York and would be responsible for reporting to the Assembly the existence or non-existence of a basis of agreement among the parties. The Minister emphasized the desirability of inviting India to sit on any body which might emerge, not only because of its contacts in Peking but also for the experience it would gain in the difficulties of negotiations with Far-Eastern Communists. He indicated in addition that while Canada would certainly not press for a place on any United Nations commission, which might be set up, we might be willing to serve if our assistance were requested.

10. It was generally implied, although not spelled out in any detail, that the terms of reference of any United Nations commission set up would be based on the principle of a free, unified Korea with a government elected by democratic processes. Further, its terms of reference would be limited to settlement of the Korean problem with no mandate given it to discuss Chinese representation, Formosa, or other Far Eastern problems. The commission would have a mandate to discuss the Korean settlement with all interested powers.

11. Gross thanked the Minister for his suggestions, and expressed the hope that we might put any further thoughts we had on paper and give them soon, not only to Washington but to the delegation here. Mr. Pearson said we would do so as soon as possible. For that reason, we would be grateful to have an early expression of views from the department on:

(a) The procedure which might be followed in bringing the post-armistice problem of Korea before the General Assembly;

(b) The type of resolution which might serve as a useful base for debate in the General Assembly;

(c) The United Nations machinery which might be set up to carry on consideration of long-term political settlement in Korea.

The Minister has indicated that even the preliminary views of departmental officials along these lines would be useful to him in his London talks, and has expressed the hope that it might be possible for some such expression of views to be sent to him in London within the next few days. We shall continue to canvass the views of other delegations here. Ends.

KOREA

1. This message is a summary of my own impressions of the armistice negotiations. It seems more likely than not that an armistice will be concluded. The United Nations negotiators have succeeded in securing their main desiderata on the line for contact and demilitarized zone. The discussions over supervision are now in an extremely complicated phase, but I think that something that can be accepted is likely to emerge. It is essential that the Communists give some real satisfaction on the question of prisoners of war, and we do not yet know what their position will be. The final item of recommendations to governments ought not to produce a long wrangle; if no agreement can be reached on joint recommendations, separate recommendations from each side might be forwarded.

2. It is becoming apparent that the basic sanction of observance of the armistice depends partly on good faith but that a lively fear on the Communist side of the consequences of a flagrant violation should be created because of our lack of confidence in their good intentions.

3. As suggested in paragraph 2 of WA-4149, no system of supervision of the terms can be fully effective even if the Communists were to accept all the United Nations proposals. In addition to the impossibility of banning a build-up in Manchuria, complete inspection along the Yalu River is physically impossible. The Yalu is frozen from source to mouth during the winter months and can be crossed anywhere, and I am told that there are many points at which it can easily be crossed by men and supplies even when it is open. The lateral roads on the Manchurian side would permit undetected movements to selected points of crossing other than the regular ports of entry. There are nine or ten regular ports of entry, coastal and interior, at which inspection would be desirable, but movement through them could easily be avoided.

4. Another point to consider is that the armistice may remain in effect for a long time because the negotiation of a political settlement proves impossible. Elaborate supervision procedures included in the armistice itself might well lead to constant wrangles and mutual charges of violation, which would prevent a gradual easing of tension and keep passions alive. Given that nothing in the armistice terms could really guarantee its faithful observance, my conclusion is that we should accept the best arrangements that can be made banning reinforcement in Korea and creating a supervisory body, but recognize that the only recourse in case of bad faith is to resume fighting and remove some of the limitations on operations against China.

5. This message up to this point was prepared before I received Reid's telegram to Mr. Pearson repeated in EX-2331 of December 5th. Some of the points made in that telegram have been clarified as a result of my discussion with Hickerson yesterday. I feel moved, however, to enter a demurrer against the negative approach to the question of a declaration taken in this telegram. It seems to me only common sense that the other side should understand that if the fighting ceases because of an armistice they will only resume it deliberately with very grave consequences to themselves. We can argue about just what these consequences should initially be, but we cannot prescribe in advance the courses of action which the United Nations forces might have to take to protect themselves. My own belief is that if there were a flagrant sustained and substantial breach of the armistice terms by the Communists, this would mean that the Chinese and Russians were deliberately incurring the risk of a general war.

6. Surely, the main accomplishment of the United Nations in Korea has been to warn the Communist hierarchy that they cannot undertake military aggression without the risk of grave consequences, including the possibility of general war. The military intervention of the United Nations forces itself constituted such a warning in the most compelling terms. It would seem logical, therefore, that if hostilities were brought to an end by an armistice arrangement, this warning should be repeated by or on behalf of the United Nations. Indeed, it would seem to me that a declaration of this type might be regarded as essential in order to preserve the force and integrity of the United Nations position in resisting aggression.

7. With regard to paragraph 6 of EX-2331, it should not be overlooked that United Nations military intervention in Korea was a specific application of the general principle of deterring Communist aggression, the effects of which might not be confined to Korea alone. It does not follow that those countries that undertook to commit forces in support of this principle in Korea, by issuing or supporting the proposed declaration, commit themselves to full-scale war against China in the event of the breaking of the armistice agreement. In the exchanges which have taken place it is clear that there are to be consultations on what specific military measures might have to be undertaken in such an event.

ARMISTICE IN KOREA: PROPOSED DECLARATION

Following from the Acting Under-Secretary.

1. The problem is so complex and difficult that I would not want it to be confused by any misunderstanding by you of the Departmental position as set forth in our telegram No. 115 of December 5 to Paris for Mr. Pearson, repeated to you as EX-2331 and to London as 2174.

2. I agree with the point made in your paragraph 5 that the other side should understand that if they deliberately resume fighting after an armistice, the consequences to them would be very grave. It does not however follow from this that there should be a declaration of the kind suggested by the Americans. Instead of a declaration, the position of our side could, as the Minister suggested, be made clear to the other side in the course of the cease fire talks.

3. I agree further with the point you make in paragraph 5 of your telegram that "we cannot prescribe in advance the courses of action which the United Nations forces might have to take to protect themselves" in the event that the other side deliberately resumes fighting after an armistice. Indeed, our worry about the American proposals is in part that the Americans now are trying to get the United Kingdom and presumably us to agree that a minimum initial course of action should be the bombing of Chinese air bases, communications and supply depots, and a naval blockade. (Your telegram WA-4149 of December 5, paragraph 7.) It is one thing to give a warning to the Chinese, either in the form of a public declaration or during the cease fire talks; it is another thing for the Americans or for any of us to commit ourselves now to precise courses of military action which we would take against China in the event of a flagrant breach of the armistice.

4. I am inclined to share your belief that "if there were a flagrant, sustained and substantial breach of the armistice terms by the Communists, this would mean that the Chinese and Russians were deliberately incurring the risk of a general war". Since there is, however, a distinct possibility that this belief may not be well founded, I suggest it would be unwise for us now to make commitments based on this belief which assumes that the North Koreans can be controlled by the Chinese and the Russians, and that the Chinese would not agree to a breach of the armistice without Russian concurrence and vice versa. If twelve months from now there is a flagrant, sustained and substantial breach of the armistice terms by the South Koreans, would this mean that the Americans and the British were deliberately incurring the risk of a general war? The parallel of course is far from perfect but might it not be unwise to assume that there are no significant similarities in the relationships between the United States, the United Kingdom and the South Koreans on the one side and between the Chinese, the Russians and the North Koreans on the other?

Secretary of State for External Affairs to High Commissioner in United Kingdom

TELEGRAM 2199 Ottawa, December 7, 1951

TOP SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Washington EX-2343; Paris No. 124.
Following for the Minister from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: The exchange of views concerning a declaration on the breach of an armistice in Korea and the steps to be taken following the conclusion of an armistice has now become so complicated that it would perhaps be well to begin by a general review of what the United States appears to want.

2. The United States appears to want to draw a line in East Asia beyond which the Chinese cannot cross because they will be deterred by the threat of dire consequences on the analogy of the deterring of Soviet aggression in Berlin and Western Germany. It is proposed that this line be drawn by a general statement to the effect that "a breach of the armistice by the Communist forces would be a very serious matter and would make impossible the localization of the subsequent conflict". This declaration, in the view of the United States, should preferably be made collectively by the 16 governments with troops in Korea, although the United States appears to be willing to have the declaration embodied in or approved by a resolution of the General Assembly.

3. The initial purpose of the declaration is stated to be that of deterring a breach of the armistice by Communist forces. It appears to be assumed that these forces act by some central and possibly single direction. As far as can be deduced this central direction in Korea is considered to be vested in the Central People's Government of China though it is obviously assumed that the Soviet Union is in complete accord with China on the Korean question. There is a good deal of evidence in our opinion to support this view, though the evidence is by no means conclusive and it might therefore be dangerous to base policy too firmly on the belief that the Soviet Union, China and North Korea are as unanimous on the implementation of Communist doctrine as they are on their belief in that doctrine.

4. The declaration once made, in the view of the United States, must be capable of being implemented in case of need through military action. Such action, initially, should include a naval blockade of China and the bombing of air bases, supply centres and communications centres not only in Manchuria but in the rest of China as well. The United States has informed us that such action would be the result of a "major attack on the forces of the United Nations". The United States has also informed us that the action to be taken in the case of "convincing evidence through build-up in Manchuria (or indeed in Korea) that an attack was imminent" is not included in the present negotiations. This, so it seems to us, is not satisfactory in that it is obviously a contingency which should be faced. It is probably safe to assume that in the event of such convincing evidence the United States would ask for a further declaration that a build-up would justify active opposition. The United States has said that it will not discuss the ultimate limits of military measures in the event of a breach of the armistice at all and that it will not discuss immediate military measures in the meeting of ambassadors in Washington.

5. General Bradley has said that it is his opinion that the Chinese have had enough in Korea and would be "unlikely to violate the armistice". It seems to me that if the Chinese violate the armistice they must realize that they are likely to provoke a large-scale war and that they will do so because they are willing to accept this risk. For this purpose a declaration is not needed. In these circumstances, it is perhaps admissible to consider the motives behind the United States desire for a declaration. Undoubtedly, the desire to make it clear beyond all question that they will tolerate no breach of the armistice comes foremost but there are probably subsidiary motives as well. For example, it will be easier for the Administration in the United States to meet its critics if it can point out that in accepting a less than ideal armistice it has taken steps to try to rectify the lack of perfection. Also, the United States Administration may think that it will be easier to withdraw a large proportion of their troops from Korea if there is in existence some explicit threat that the troops will return if advantage is taken of their withdrawal. Thirdly, the United States government might be hoping that by means of a declaration it will commit its present allies to further activity in Korea in case of need.

6. The post-armistice procedure the United States appears to envisage may be outlined as follows:

(a) A report from General Ridgway to the Security Council indicating that in the interests of securing an armistice, the armistice has been accepted without "completely satisfactory" inspection procedures but that an armistice has been concluded and that firing has ceased;

(b) The Security Council would then note with satisfaction General Ridgway's report. Some officers in the State Department appear to want to include a reference to the earlier resolutions by the Security Council and the General Assembly dealing with Korea but they appear to realize that the inclusion of such references might endanger the plan by provoking a Soviet veto. As the United States plan appears acceptable in its broad outline, it would seem to us to be wise to support those in the State Department who favour the omission of any reference to the earlier resolutions. A resolution confining itself to noting with satisfaction would not involve the Security Council in any relinquishment of its interest in Korea and would not tamper with the Unified Command in any way. The continued existence of the Unified Command is apparently a strong consideration with the United States government, and one which we would certainly wish to support;

(c) A second resolution might be introduced into the Security Council to invite the General Assembly to consider a post-armistice settlement in Korea. It is our view, however, that such a resolution is unnecessary and might well prove unwise. It is unnecessary because the General Assembly can debate such a subject if an appropriate item is put on its agenda; it does not have to depend on the Security Council to put the item there. Such a resolution might be unwise for several reasons. One is that there would be a great temptation to refer to earlier resolutions and to include statements of principle. The inclusion of references to earlier resolutions might transform the resolution from a procedural into a substantive one. The inclusion of statements of principle might provoke a Soviet veto for the reason that the Soviet Union has hitherto taken the position that the future of Korea was a matter not for the General Assembly, nor for the Security Council but for the Big Four. They might also object to referring the matter to a body where the Central People's Government of China is not represented although it is barely possible that they might acquiesce if the initiative were taken by the General Assembly;

(d) The United States is anxious to avoid any discussion of Korea in the General Assembly until an armistice has been signed. There are two items, numbers 17 and 67, which deal with Korea. This United States suggestion is well taken.

7. The United States apparently has not yet formulated definite views on the way in which the General Assembly could tackle its problem. It has considered four methods: (1) an advisory commission, possibly linked with a mediator; (2) a good offices commission; (3) a negotiating commission; and (4) a United Nations mediator acting alone. Any of these four bodies should, in the view of the United States, be instructed to proceed on the basis of a free, unified Korea with a government elected by democratic processes, and there would be no latitude to include other subjects such as the future of Formosa and the Chinese seat in the United Nations. With this position we should agree.

8. The following are the terms on which the United States is willing to proceed to a political settlement. I comment on these in the order in which they are given in paragraph 7 of telegram No. 152 of December 6 from the Canadian Delegation in Paris:

(a) The United States will not agree to any system in which spokesmen of the United States government and the governments of North Korea and China would have to meet together as representatives of governments. This is obviously connected with the question of recognition and therefore we may have to accept United States insistence on this point for the time being. In consequence the only methods open for the negotiation of a political settlement in Korea are the four types of commissions named in paragraph 7.

(b) Preference for a mediator who is an American (we assume this to mean a U.S. citizen) if maintained would rule out the possibility of a single mediator. While Americans such as, for example, Bunche and Graham appear to us to be dispassionate and impartial, it is unlikely that they would appear so to the Chinese or the Russians. After all, if the Americans can trust nobody but an American, it is hardly to be expected that the Chinese or the Russians could trust an American. If the United States could be persuaded to modify its views on this point, a neutral mediator might be found. As the reasons for favouring an American mediator are not given, it is impossible to assess whether such a change is possible.

(c) The inclusion of all four of the Big Four powers on a commission presumably refers to the United States, the United Kingdom, France, and the Soviet Union and, therefore, excludes the question of Chinese representation. But the presence of these four powers must lead to a large commission if there are to be on it any powers not directly concerned in the war. A commission of seven would appear to be almost mandatory unless the United States can be persuaded to give up this preference. It might be worth while to urge the Five Power group, excluding the United Kingdom and France, as you have suggested.

(d) The lack of concern in the United States Government over the prolongation of post-armistice negotiations has already been made plain to us by Mr. Rusk in a conversation with Mr. Wrong in Washington. Internal evidence, noticeably desiderata (b) and (e) in this list, give the impression that prolongation of the negotiations might even be considered advantageous.

(e) Insistence on reaffirming existing General Assembly and Security Council resolutions on Korea in any new General Assembly resolution might well lead to the failure of the whole plan. Reaffirmation of the past resolutions will add nothing and might lead to failure to secure the necessary degree of co-operation from the Soviet Union and Communist China. All the present "neutrals" would probably consider a resolution containing such reaffirmations as a propaganda device.

(f) We do not read this desideratum as meaning that in actual practice the United States will oppose the use of representatives of countries commonly spoken of as neutrals.

9. Taking the foregoing considerations into account, I think that a brief outline of the most desirable plan to be followed is as set forth below:

(a) The Security Council should note with approval the report of General Ridgway that an armistice has been concluded.

(b) The First Committee of the General Assembly should consider a resolution noting the conclusion of the armistice with approval, favouring the unification of Korea under a democratically-elected government (provided the Soviet Union does not object too strongly to this) and setting up a sub-committee consisting of five individuals (one the Chairman of the First Committee and four members to be chosen by him from the United States, the Soviet Union, India, and one other state).

(c) The terms of reference of the sub-committee would be to use its good offices in trying to reach a long-term political settlement of the Korean problem. We would interpret this to mean that the sub-committee would meet with representatives of the People's Republic of China and the North Korean authorities on the one hand and with representatives of the governments of the United States and South Korea on the other hand. It would not be necessary for all members of the sub-committee to meet with the representatives of any given government.

10. In coming to these conclusions, we have been influenced not only by the consideration outlined in paragraph 6 of Mr. Wrong's telegram WA-4153 of December 6 that "the main accomplishment of the United Nations in Korea has been to warn the Communist hierarchy that they could not undertake military aggression without the risk of grave consequences, including the possibility of general war" but also by the action of the Chinese in the fall of 1950 clearly indicating (and this appears to be an historical axiom, not merely a matter of ideology) that China will not accept a hostile regime in Korea: that so long as an attempt is made to unify all of Korea under a government hostile to China, China will ensure that we have years of unrest in the Far East.

KOREA — UNITED STATES UNITED KINGDOM NEGOTIATIONS ON DECLARATION ON BREACH OF ARMISTICE ETC.

Following for the Under-Secretary, Begins: We have learned on a most personal and confidential basis that Australian High Commissioner in London has reported in telegrams to Casey in Washington that the United States attitude is that negotiations on the Korean settlement should be kept at present on a bilateral basis between the United States and the United Kingdom and should not be communicated to the Commonwealth Governments mentioned in paragraph 9 of EX-2308 of December 1st (this view was apparently made known to the Foreign Office by means of a memorandum from the United States Ambassador in London). High Commissioner reported that the Foreign Office and Commonwealth Relations Office were pressing for the ban to be lifted and hoped that Mr. Eden would soon be able to telegraph the United Kingdom Embassy in Washington to this effect. The Australian messages further stated that Commonwealth Relations Office will very shortly be communicating with Commonwealth Governments mentioned above to the following effect:

(1) The United Kingdom will insist that these Commonwealth Governments be taken into confidence,

(2) The United Kingdom believes that if inspection terms were satisfactory or even relatively satisfactory, warning declaration would be unduly provocative and might harden Chinese opposition,

(3) The United Kingdom is inclined to interpret the establishment of a neutral inspecting organ as "relatively satisfactory". Ends.

Message personnel du secrétaire d'État des Relations du Commonwealth du Royaume-Uni pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Personal Message from Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations of United Kingdom to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TOP SECRET [London], December 13, 1951

High Commissioner will convey to you information as to the further approach which Mr. Acheson has made to Foreign Secretary regarding warnings which might be given to Communists in regard to major infractions of any armistice terms, including arrangements for supervision. Our High Commissioner will also give you the terms of the reply which Foreign Secretary is making.[65]

This exchange of views does not, of course, take the place of the consultations which, at the appropriate stage, will have to take place with the various Governments with forces in Korea. The exchange is nothing more than a means of ensuring that the views of the United Kingdom and United States are not widely divergent when definite proposals have to be formulated. You will also see that in fact we and the United States are by no means yet in line with each other in our thinking on the subject.

I have thought it only right that even at this very preliminary stage you should be kept informed, but it would I think be helpful if you would keep the information to a very narrow circle in Canada, as is being done here.

[65] Voir/See FRUS, 1951, Volume VII, pp. 1238-9, 1249-50, 1317-19.

There has been no communication at all as yet on the subject between the United States and the foreign countries concerned. The United Kingdom cannot, of course, speak for another Commonwealth country at any time unless requested to do so and, on this occasion, were in any case precluded from doing so by United States insistence on informal and bilateral consultation, to which they wish to confine present United Kingdom/United States exchange of views. But we have insisted with United States on necessity of our keeping you informed. In spite of these difficulties, we here shall naturally be very glad to have any views which you may feel able to express in the light of this personal exchange between Mr. Acheson and the Foreign Secretary.

Message personnel du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État des Relations du Commonwealth du Royaume-Uni

Personal Message from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for Commonwealth Relations of United Kingdom

TOP SECRET Ottawa, December 14, 1951

Thank you for your personal message of December 13 concerning the recent exchanges of views between Mr. Eden and Mr. Acheson on a warning statement which might be made of the consequences of a major breach of the armistice which we all hope will soon be concluded in Korea.

2. I am making sure that the information which you have been good enough to pass to me is safeguarded by being made known to a very narrow circle in Canada.

3. I am in substantial agreement with Mr. Eden's comments on the United States proposals and I am particularly pleased that Mr. Eden has emphasized the need to have a positive plan for action in the event of the armistice being concluded and loyally observed. There are two points on which I should like to comment.

4. Mr. Eden's revision of the last paragraph of the State Department's draft declaration is, in my opinion, a great improvement over the original. Mr. Eden, however, has retained in his revision the term "aggression" which appears in the State Department draft. The effect of this is to relate the warning to "another act of aggression" and not to a major breach of the armistice. It seems to me essential to restrict the warning to the consequences of a major breach of the armistice. Otherwise the warning could be interpreted to involve a special commitment of indefinite duration to defend against aggression whatever permanent settlement in Korea may emerge from the discussions which we hope will take place after the conclusion of an armistice.

5. This interpretation could not be given if the last two sentences of the proposed declaration were to read as follows: "We affirm that if there is a breach of the armistice which challenges again the principles of the United Nations, we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that it might then prove impossible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea".

6. I note that the conclusion of the State Department is that "a collective statement by the United Nations is not practicable". I am not convinced that this conclusion is justified. In order to secure an overwhelming majority in the United Nations it would, of course, be necessary to tone down any statement about the consequences of a major breach of the armistice. The farthest that the United Nations General Assembly might be prepared to go might be to state that the consequences of a major breach of the armistice would be grave. It seems to me, however, that the advantages of action through the United Nations outweigh the disadvantages of toning down the warning.

PROPOSED DECLARATION CONCERNING BREACH OF A KOREAN ARMISTICE

1. I saw Hickerson at his request this afternoon. He had with him Raynor and Alexis Johnson. The purpose was to bring me up-to-date on the proposal for a declaration, in the event of an armistice by the governments with forces in Korea. He is seeing also the Australian, New Zealand, and South African chiefs of mission, but as yet no other governments except the United Kingdom are being consulted.

2. He said that the considered view here is that the major sanction against a Communist breach of the armistice must be the fear of the consequences and that therefore something would have to be done to make clear the consequences, even if the Communists agreed to satisfactory inspection procedures. It was quite apparent, however, that they would not agree to such procedures and that the armistice, if concluded, would fall short of adequate inspection arrangements.

3. He also said that the settled view was that the parties to the declaration should, if possible, include the sixteen governments with combat forces in Korea. They stood in a special position among the United Nations and their forces would have to face the consequences of renewed fighting. The declaration should be issued within 48 hours of the signature of the armistice. The United States Government is satisfied that it would be impossible to negotiate a satisfactory declaration in the General Assembly, but they would hope that the General Assembly would note with approval the declaration in a resolution on Korea which would have to come before it after the armistice was concluded.

4. A draft declaration was submitted last week to the British Government. The first sentence, which was acceptable in London, declared the intention of the governments concerned fully to observe the terms of the armistice and to seek a peaceful settlement in Korea. The second sentence of the United States draft was to the effect that, in the event that renewed aggression was committed in Korea, the countries responsible would receive the full retribution, without geographic limitations, which they would so richly deserve. The British have objected to this sentence as too strong and have proposed an alternative which is regarded here as too weak; it is to the effect that, in the event of a renewal of aggression, it might not be possible to confine the hostilities to Korea.

5. The United States Government is now preparing an alternative draft less emphatic than their original proposal, but more so than the British counter-proposal. Hickerson said that he would give me a copy of this alternative as soon as it was ready for presentation to London, probably tomorrow or Wednesday. He told me that they were most anxious to receive any comments or suggestions from the Canadian Government as soon as possible and asked me to assure you that full consideration would be given to the Canadian point of view.

6. He also asked that these discussions should continue to be treated as very secret, since they did not wish to broach the subject to the other governments concerned until they had got somewhere in their discussions with the British, ourselves, and the three other "old dominions". They would like to make progress as rapidly as possible in the hope that the remaining points at issue in the armistice negotiations, difficult though they are, may be settled by December 27th.

7. I said that one of the major difficulties that I saw was that, by agreeing to this statement, the governments concerned might be letting themselves in for an unlimited war in the Far East at the discretion of the Unified Command, which was the Government of the United States; I recognized that a large-scale renewal of fighting in Korea would mean that the Unified Command must be free to take steps necessary for the security of the forces, but that there were very important political as well as military considerations involved in any extension of the hostilities outside Korea. Could he throw any further light on what type of military action was contemplated? He answered that the view here was that the use of air power against any targets in China which were worth attacking from a military point of view, such as communications centres in addition to air bases, would be a quick and useful counter-stroke against renewed aggression in Korea. The Communists had some 800,000 men in Korea itself, and it was thought that they had there supplies sufficient for a 20 day general offensive. If they repaired their lines of communication from Manchuria during an armistice as they would be free to do, they would be able to maintain a sustained offensive of longer duration without adding to their forces. This possibility could be to some degree reduced if on the outbreak of further fighting there was a widespread attack on Chinese communications at any useful point. No one, he added, was thinking of using ground forces on the Asiatic mainland outside Korea. A naval blockade, however, excluding Port Arthur and Dairen, continued to be favoured by the Unified Command, even though it would not bring quick results. He did not ask for agreement at this stage to any precise military plan of action, but to the general proposition that the Communists would have to pay heavily for it in some way or other if they resumed fighting and should be made to understand this as soon as the armistice was concluded.

8. I pointed out that it might conceivably be part of general Communist strategy to draw as much of the air and land forces of the United Nations as possible into the Korean area without the Soviet Government having committed itself deeply, in order to help clear the way for Soviet invasion of Western Europe. He said that they were certainly alive to this possibility and that the decision on what to do could only be taken at the time the crisis arose. Certainly if war began in Europe, the governments concerned would not be in any way committed to keeping their forces in Korea at all. There would obviously have to be consultations as the situation developed, and he recognized that the issues involved were by no means purely military. Much would depend on the degree to which the Soviet Government committed itself in any renewal of fighting in Korea.

9. Hickerson also said that the State Department would be consulting us soon on the steps to be taken following an armistice towards the achievement of a political settlement in Korea.

PROPOSED DECLARATION CONCERNING BREACH OF A KOREAN ARMISTICE

1. We were handed by the State Department late this afternoon the re-draft referred to in paragraph 5 of my WA-4241 of December 17th. This draft is being given today to the British, Australians, New Zealanders, and South Africans for comment. The last two sentences follow closely the revision proposed by the United Kingdom, although the intimation that a renewal of fighting in Korea would involve retaliation outside Korea is in somewhat stronger language. You will note that the draft includes the change suggested by the British, conveying in effect a pledge to resist aggression anywhere. I should be glad to have your instructions as soon as possible.

2. The text of the new draft is as follows: Text begins:

We the nations participating in the Korean action support the decision of the Commander-in-Chief of the United Nations Command to conclude an armistice agreement. We hereby affirm our determination fully and faithfully to carry out the terms of that armistice. We expect that the other parties to the agreement will likewise scrupulously observe its terms.

The task ahead is not an easy one. We will support the efforts of the United Nations to bring about an equitable settlement in Korea based on the principles which have long been established by the United Nations, and which call for a united, independent and democratic Korea. We will support the United Nations in its efforts to assist the people of Korea in repairing the ravages of war.

We declare again our faith in the principles and purposes of the United Nations, our consciousness of our continuing responsibilities in Korea, and our determination in good faith to seek a settlement of the Korean problem. We affirm that if another act of aggression were to challenge again the principles of the United Nations we should again be united and prompt to resist. Should aggression be committed again in Korea the consequences would be so grave that it would, in all probability, not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea. Text ends.

PROPOSED DECLARATION CONCERNING BREACH OF A KOREAN ARMISTICE

1. I have now received your despatch Y-3565 of December 15th† covering the messages exchanged with Lord Ismay on the original United States draft and related issues. I share the view expressed in paragraph 4 of your message to Lord Ismay of December 15th that the declaration should relate to a major breach of the armistice rather than to aggression in general.

2. An additional comment relates to the sentence in Mr. Eden's revision (which is incorporated in the State Department's re-draft) beginning "we affirm that if another act of aggression ..." This sentence could be read as implying a promise by the governments party to the declaration to resist promptly "another act of aggression" anywhere in the world and not merely in Korea. I doubt whether such an interpretation was meant by the Foreign Office; it certainly would be an inappropriate and unwise undertaking for sixteen governments to make. Your own revision would look after this.

3. The State Department wants something rather more positive than either Mr. Eden's or your wording for the last sentence, as is evident from my talk with Hickerson and from the language used in their revision. The question is whether we should be prepared to go as far as this language if reference to a serious breach of the armistice is substituted for the word "aggression". I suggest that you might consider the following alternative wording for the last two sentences:

"We affirm that if the armistice should be broken by another act of aggression which challenges the principles of the United Nations we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea."

4. I doubt that we will get anywhere by pursuing the suggestion that the declaration should be made by the United Nations rather than by the governments contributing forces in Korea. The State Department and the Foreign Office agree that this course is not practicable and that the most that could be attained would be to have the declaration later noted with approval by the Assembly. The timing, which is of considerable importance, could not be controlled if the matter were thrown into the Assembly for debate. I think also that any statement which could secure the desirable large majority in the Assembly would have to be so watered down that it would mean very little.

PROPOSED DECLARATION AFTER A KOREAN ARMISTICE

1. Hickerson asked me to see him again this afternoon on this matter. I told him that I had not received your comments on my discussion with him on December 17th (my WA-4241) or on the United States redraft given us on December 18th (My WA-4246). I knew, however, that if a declaration were agreed on you would wish the last two sentences to refer to a breach of the armistice instead of to aggression generally, and I mentioned the terms of the revision which I suggested to you in paragraph 3 of my WA-4263. He appeared to think that a revision on these lines would probably be acceptable here.

2. He told me that last night telegrams had been despatched to the United States Ambassadors in France, Greece, Turkey, Belgium and the Netherlands instructing them to submit the proposed declaration to those governments. The Belgians were to be asked to inform the Luxembourg Government, as the Luxembourg contingent is part of the Belgian battalion in Korea. This left the governments of Thailand, the Philippines, Colombia and Ethiopia still to be consulted. They are putting this off for the moment because of their great anxiety to maintain complete secrecy. He asked that we should not in Ottawa or here indicate to any of the missions of the countries consulted, other than those of the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, that we had been brought into the picture earlier.

3. He read me a telegram sent last night by Mr. Gifford stating that Mr. Eden had told him that the last United States draft was acceptable to him, but that he would have to secure Cabinet concurrence, which he proposed to do at the earliest opportunity.

4. He went on to say that his special reason for seeing me today was to tell me the views expressed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff at a long discussion yesterday, at which he and Johnson represented the State Department. This left him with the strong impression that agreement on the issuance of a declaration on the lines proposed as soon as possible after the signature of an armistice might make the difference in getting an armistice at all. (The Joint Chiefs have not yet approved the draft, but have not raised objections to it.) The Joint Chiefs were particularly concerned over the danger of airfield construction and reconstruction in Korea at points which would permit jet fighters to operate efficiently against the United Nations ground forces. Three such fields have already been built, but are not now operational because of the damage inflicted by bombing. It seems fairly certain that the Communists will refuse to accept a commitment against the repair and employment of airfields in Korea as part of the armistice terms, which would be policed by the stationing of observer teams at the airports. The Joint Chiefs were only inclined to give in on this if a solemn warning of the consequences of violating the armistice were issued.

5. He also referred again to the Joint Chiefs' concern about the possibilities of a sudden attack without the movement of additional supplies and forces to Korea if the Communists were able to repair their railways and roads during an armistice. The latest estimate of Far East Command is that there are 770,000 Communist troops in Korea with adequate supplies for a 26-day major offensive. If they were able to move supplies in quantity from Manchuria over repaired lines of communications, they could continue an offensive for a considerably longer period. Therefore the Joint Chiefs thought that for this military reason also a grave warning must be issued.

6. In addition he mentioned the problem of morale in South Korea. If the armistice endured for some time and the United Nations forces were reduced the South Koreans might feel that they were being deserted by the United Nations and the way would be opened for Communist subversion and infiltration. A solemn assurance would help to meet this risk.

7. I told him that you continue to see advantages in aiming at a declaration by the General Assembly rather than by the sixteen countries. He repeated with emphasis reinforced by the views of the Joint Chiefs, the argument he had previously given me. These are, first, that the declaration must be made almost immediately after the signing of the armistice, secondly, that any resolution for which a large majority could be secured in the United Nations would be so diluted in substance as not to meet the requirements.

8. I hope that you will be able to send me your comments very shortly. We are having a discussion within a day or two with the State Department on the means of proceeding towards a settlement after an armistice comes into effect.

PROPOSED DECLARATION ON KOREA

The fresh draft of the declaration, as you say, includes the changes suggested by the British with the addition of stronger language in the last sentence. I think, however, that there may have been a misinterpretation of British motives and that it was not Mr. Eden's intention that this declaration should be a pledge to resist aggression wherever it might occur. Our conversations with Earnscliffe lead us to believe that Mr. Eden was confining himself to Korea.

2. Even if it was the British intention to give a pledge against aggression anywhere this does not meet my views, which have been outlined in EX-2391 of December 18† and in the exchange of personal messages with Lord Ismay which you will by now have received. I would prefer that any declaration should be confined to the consequences of a major breach of the armistice and should not appear to give a blanket pledge against aggression in general or to give a timeless guarantee in Korea. These limitations as to time and place are taken care of in the redraft of the last two sentences of the declaration which I sent to you yesterday:

"We affirm that if there is a breach of the armistice which challenges again the principles of the United Nations, we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that it might then prove impossible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea."

3. In communicating my views on what a declaration could suitably contain, I should like you to let it be understood that I am not necessarily at this time agreeing to subscribe to a declaration made outside the United Nations. I am not convinced that the possibility of giving an adequate warning through the United Nations has yet been thoroughly explored. I realize that a declaration made through the United Nations might have to be somewhat milder in language than that proposed by the United States but this might be advantageous rather than disadvantageous, providing that the modification did not remove all warning significance from the declaration.

SECRET [London], December 22, 1951

KOREA ARMISTICE TALKS

Your personal message of December 15th has been discussed with Foreign Secretary and was considered by Cabinet yesterday when they had before them United States suggestions for further amendments of the draft statement.

As our High Commissioner will inform you we have told the United States that we are prepared to accept their amended text but have at the same time made it clear that this is subject to further discussion between the United States, United Kingdom, Canadian, Australian, New Zealand and South African Governments, and that in particular we think there is much force in your criticism (which we have not ascribed to you by name) about the use of the term "aggression". I assume that you will now have yourself put this point to the United States Government and we should be very glad to learn of their reactions from you.

With reference to paragraph 6 of your message we have also told the Americans that we agree with you that action by the United Nations would be preferable if it is practicable. But is it? We should be most grateful for your further views on this point having regard first to the general acceptability to the Assembly of the draft, as now revised, and secondly to the possibility of Soviet or Egyptian opposition leading to an undesirable split vote in the Assembly, and probably to long and acrimonious discussion of the whole Korean issue there. There is also the possibility of certain States abstaining on a resolution implying risk of an extension of hostilities to other parts of Asia. We might therefore find any resolution so watered down to secure the necessary majority as to become unacceptable to the United States Government. In all the circumstances our own feeling is that most practical solution might be for statement to be addressed to the Assembly by the powers with forces in Korea.

PROPOSED DECLARATION AFTER A KOREAN ARMISTICE

1. I regret that my message to you, EX-2406, of December 20 containing my redraft of the last two sentences of the declaration and setting forth my views on how to bring the declaration within the United Nations, did not reach you in time to be of assistance to you in your interview with Hickerson on Thursday afternoon.

2. On December 20 I repeated to London my telegram EX-2406. I also requested our High Commissioners in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa to inform these three Governments of the amendment which I had suggested of the last two sentences of the declaration, and the views set forth in paragraph 3 of my telegram to you No. EX-2406.

3. It appears, however, that your compromise draft of the last two sentences has been forwarded to London and, according to a message which I have just received from Lord Ismay, accepted by the Cabinet there. This puts us in somewhat of a difficulty. The last sentence of your compromise we are now prepared to accept, though I still think that our original wording is preferable. However, in the revision you suggest to the first sentence, you refer to the possibility of the armistice being broken by "another act of aggression". The use of this language might be interpreted to mean that the Security Council or the General Assembly would have to declare that another act of aggression had taken place before action was possible. Our draft, on the other hand, regarded any breach of the armistice which constituted a challenge to the principles of the United Nations as a continuation of the old aggression. For this reason, we prefer our original draft of this first sentence and hope that the State Department will agree to it. I have informed Clutterbuck, who called on me this morning, to this effect.

4. So far as the relationship of the declaration to the United Nations is concerned, we will not press for any U.N. resolution embodying its terms. We would hope, however, that the U.N. could endorse the declaration in some way, or at least that it could be brought formally to its attention. In the note which Clutterbuck left with me from his Secretary of State, he suggests that the most practical solution would be for the declaration to be addressed to the Assembly by the powers with forces in Korea, though he does not indicate how this should be done.

PROPOSED DECLARATION AFTER A KOREAN ARMISTICE

1. I left a memorandum with Alexis Johnson on the morning of December 24th. I judge from what he said that there is unlikely to be any difficulty here in substituting reference to a breach of the armistice for the term "aggression" used in the State Department's draft. Johnson said that the word "aggression" had been used to make it clear that the warning would apply only in the event of a renewal of the war in Korea in violation of the armistice, and not to incidents short of this. I told him that we should certainly have no objection to their adding to our proposed redraft a qualifying adjective, such as "major" or "serious" before the words "breach of the armistice". He and Hickerson have both told me that they saw merit in our comment that if the word "aggression" were used it could be interpreted as requiring a finding by the Security Council or General Assembly before action could be taken.

2. I also have had a word with the Secretary of State on limiting this part of the declaration to a violation of the armistice, and he appeared to agree.

3. I asked Johnson whether they were contemplating an extension of the 30-day limit for agreement on the line of contact under item 2 of the agenda for the armistice talks. He said that as the battle-line had not changed during the 30 days it would not be necessary to secure an extension, but agreed that if on December 27th it looked as though the remaining points at issue might be resolved within a brief period an extension to a specific date might help to secure the completion of the negotiations.

4. Since the memorandum left with Johnson varied in some minor details from the version given in your EX-2433, I am repeating it in my following message. None of the differences is of any importance, but if you are giving the memorandum wider circulation it will be well to use the exact text handed to the State Department.

PROPOSED DECLARATION AFTER A KOREAN ARMISTICE

The text of the memorandum given the State Department on December 24th is as follows:

1. If an armistice is concluded in Korea, the government of Canada is prepared to concur in the publication of a warning declaration by the governments with combat forces in Korea, provided that a change is made in the last two sentences of the draft submitted to the Canadian Embassy by the Department of State on December 18th and that the Department of State is in agreement with the understandings set forth below.

2. On the text of the declaration, the Canadian Government considers that the warning in the last paragraph should be restricted to Korea and should refer to a serious breach of the armistice rather than to an act of aggression. The purpose of the declaration is to seek to ensure the faithful observance of the armistice by the Communists until a political settlement can be achieved. Furthermore, the use of a term "another act of aggression" instead of "breach of the armistice" might be interpreted to mean that the Security Council or General Assembly would have to find that a new act of aggression had taken place before action was possible. The adoption of the following language in these sentences would meet this point:

"We affirm that if there is a breach of the armistice which challenges again the principles of the United Nations we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea".

3. The Canadian Government would prefer that the warning of the consequences in the final sentence of the declaration should be in less specific language such as: "The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that it might then prove impossible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea". It is, however, prepared to accept the stronger language suggested by the Department of State if the other governments concerned consider that this would be acceptable.

4. It is the understanding of the Canadian Government that participation in the declaration does not commit the parties to any particular form of sanctions if a major breach of the armistice takes place.

5. It would be preferable for the declaration to be made by the United Nations rather than by the sixteen governments with forces in Korea, but the serious difficulties in the way of embodying a satisfactory declaration in a resolution of the United Nations are recognized. The Canadian Government, however, is firmly of the opinion that the declaration should, if possible, be endorsed in some way by United Nations' action, or at the very least brought formally to the attention of the United Nations.

6. An early expression of the views of the Department of State on these suggestions would be welcomed.

PROPOSED DECLARATION AFTER A KOREAN ARMISTICE

1. The State Department has this afternoon given us a new wording for the last two sentences of the draft declaration, which has been prepared in order to meet both the Canadian criticism and criticism made by some other governments. Their new draft reads as follows: "We affirm, in the interests of world peace, that if there is a renewal of the armed attack, challenging again the principles of the United Nations, we should again be united and prompt to resist. The consequences of such a breach of the armistice would be so grave that, in all probability, it would not be possible to confine hostilities within the frontiers of Korea".

2. They are most anxious to get the concurrence of the governments consulted by Friday at latest, a main reason being that the negotiations about the supervision of the armistice are making no real progress and they therefore want to be able to inform Ridgway that he can rely on the publication of the declaration. This would enable the United Nations negotiators to make some concessions which they otherwise are not prepared to propose.

3. The new language is designed to make clear the following points:

(a) That the pledge applies to Korea only;

(b) That it would be effective only during the period of the armistice;

(c) That counter-action against a renewed attack would be undertaken without seeking new authority from the United Nations.

4. We were also given verbal comments on the other points made in our memorandum of December 24th. On our suggestion in paragraph 3 that the Canadian Government would prefer less specific language in the final sentence of the declaration, their view is that the language proposed is as unprovocative as can be devised if the necessities of the situation are to be met; no other government has proposed less specific language, except the British Government which has now agreed to the stronger version. On paragraph 4, the State Department agrees that the declaration does not commit the parties to any particular form of sanctions, commenting that the action required in the event of a renewal of the war must depend on the military situation at the time. On paragraph 5, they certainly hope it will prove possible to secure an endorsement of the declaration by the General Assembly and will work to this end.

5. Of the governments already consulted, the United Kingdom, Turkey and Greece have definitely accepted the United States proposals; Belgium and the Netherlands are prepared to go along with whatever the United Kingdom approves; South Africa, Australia and New Zealand do not seem to have approved specifically as yet; no word has been received from the French Government. They have not extended the consultations yet to include Thailand, the Philippines, Ethiopia and Colombia, presumably on the ground that they wish to get an agreed text between the 12 other governments before approaching them.

PROPOSED DECLARATION AFTER A KOREAN ARMISTICE

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: We have examined the text of the last two sentences submitted by the State Department and consider that, although there is still room for improvement, we need not press for any further revisions, in view of the attitude of the United States and other governments with forces in Korea.

2. The revised text meets our essential requirements as stated by the Minister and discussed by him with the Prime Minister. For this reason, I do not propose to consult the Minister again before authorizing you to tell the State Department that we now give our agreement to the wording of the declaration on the understanding, already settled, that agreement to it does not commit the parties to any particular form of sanction. You are accordingly authorized to communicate to the State Department the agreement of the Canadian Government. Ends.

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 56-51 Ottawa, February 20, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS PROGRAMMES FOR KOREAN AND PALESTINE RELIEF

A. Korean Relief

On November 22, 1950, Cabinet authorized the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly to agree that the Canadian Government, subject to Parliamentary approval, would contribute to the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Programme in Korea 3.2% of the total funds required for the period January 1, 1951 to early 1952, subject to the condition that the contribution should not exceed $8 million.

2. The Report of the United Nations Negotiating Committee made public on February 1, 1951, indicates that a total sum of approximately $225 million has been offered, the largest offers being as follows:

	Millions of $ U.S.
United States	162.50
United Kingdom	28.00
Canada	7.50
Thailand	4.37
Australia	4.30
Philippines	3.73
Brazil	2.70
Uruguay	2.14

3. The decision of the Unified Command to remain in Korea, and the likelihood that it will continue to control all South Korea, mean the creation of a relatively stable situation for both immediate and long-term planning. An Agent-General for Korean Relief has been appointed and is now making a preliminary survey in Korea. The Unified Command states that the need is now greater than ever since the country has been thrice fought over; physical destruction is greater; large numbers of destitute refugees crowd the area held by the United Nations and adjacent islands; and the Chinese Army is carrying typhus to the civilian population.

B. Palestine Relief

4. On June 12, 1950, Cabinet, after authorizing a Canadian contribution of $750,000, to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees, directed that the head of the Agency be informed that:

> "If the initial sum of $750,000 has been fully used up or earmarked for programmed purchases in Canada by December 31, 1950, and if he requires more funds, the Canadian Government would give sympathetic consideration to a request for a further $750,000."

5. In a telegram dated January 2, 1951, the Director of the Agency, General Howard Kennedy, urgently requested a further contribution of $750,000 for the period January to June 1951. As of this date the original contribution has all been used or earmarked for programmed purchases in Canada.

6. It is recommended that Cabinet authorize, subject to Parliamentary approval, the contribution by the Canadian Government of $7.2 million to the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Programme in Korea, and of $750,000 to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees, the total sum of $7.95 million to be voted in the final supplementary estimates for 1950-51.[66]

KOREAN RELIEF

(cf. Heads of Division Meeting No. 10 of March 12, 1951)

39. Mr. McInnes. J. Donald Kingsley, Agent-General for Korean Relief, recently returned to Geneva from Korea, visiting New York en route to communicate his findings to the United Nations Secretariat. It was his opinion (subsequently amplified by a Press Conference which he gave in Geneva and which was fully reported in the New York Times of March 11) that UNKRA would have to be "completely integrated" with the Unified Command.

40. Our Delegation to the United Nations was instructed to enquire whether Kingsley's views represented those of the United Nations, and also to express our belief that such an arrangement would not be acceptable to the contributing nations. Meanwhile protests had been received by the Secretariat from a number of delegations; and Cordier informed CPDUN that he was "not happy" about the situation. CPDUN then approached the United States Mission which, though apparently reluctant to discuss the matter, admitted that the question of the status of UNKRA was very much a subject of concern to the State Department and the Unified Command. The United States Mission emphasized that no final or definite arrangements had yet been made.

41. We also expressed concern over Kingsley's proposal to operate Korean relief from Geneva as Director-General of IRO. While we had known that he would be carrying on both jobs simultaneously, we had assumed that since IRO was winding up this year, Kingsley would be able to devote more attention to Korean relief. Such is apparently not the case, and Kingsley is presently proposing to send his deputy, Rucker, to Korea and to remain himself in Geneva. We asked our delegation in New York to look into the matter and to suggest informally, but in definite language, that we do not regard Kingsley's absentee Agent-Generalship with favour and that we feel, in any case, that he should not have assumed this position nor made his Geneva statement without a prior meeting of the Advisory Committee. The United Nations Secretariat is also dissatisfied with the proposed arrangements to have the headquarters of UNKRA in Geneva, as well as with the relationship between UNKRA and the Unified Command, and is anxious that the Advisory Committee be called.

42. It does not appear that anything final can be done until after the meeting of the General Council of the IRO in Geneva on April 9. This meeting will consider not only IRO problems, but also the confirmation of the appointment of Kingsley as Agent-General for Korean relief. If, as is expected, it confirms his appointment, he can then appear before the Advisory Committee.

Reference: My teletype No. 364 of April 3, 1951,† and previous communications.

AGENT-GENERAL FOR KOREAN RELIEF

1. We have acquired from members of the Secretariat and other delegations a certain amount of additional information concerning the position of Mr. Kingsley and of UNKRA. We understand that immediately after Mr. Kingsley made his ill-timed definition of policy in Geneva, he was sent by the Secretary-General an extremely strong reprimand. To this reprimand Mr. Kingsley replied with an equally strong retort. We are not aware of the exact contents of either of these communications, but we are told that Mr. Kingsley took a somewhat high handed attitude to the United Nations and any efforts on the part of the Secretariat to interfere in the work of himself or the Unified Command. Apparently, however, he repented in a short time and sent an apology. Colonel Katzin was then despatched to Geneva to tell Mr. Kingsley that he was not to issue statements on policy and also to tell him of the serious concern held by some governments regarding the status of UNKRA. Colonel Katzin came back to New York on Wednesday, April 4, and Crepault had a talk with him yesterday concerning the results of his negotiation.

2. According to Colonel Katzin, he was able to convince Mr. Kingsley that it would be disastrous to the whole Korean relief operation if care wasn't taken to assure UNKRA's autonomy. It was pointed out to Mr. Kingsley that for him to try to sweep aside political considerations in a venture of this nature would certainly undermine the confidence of those governments which had assented to his appointment and might jeopardize the whole financial basis of the operation. Colonel Katzin was confident that Kingsley finally appreciated the well-founded necessity of this approach, and agreed to inform Unified Command immediately of his "conversion". You will find as an annex† to this despatch the text of the telegram which Mr. Kingsley subsequently sent to the United Command and which was shown to us by Colonel Katzin in strict confidence.

3. It will be seen by this communication that Mr. Kingsley has modified to some extent his original position, and that he now seems prepared to adopt a more sensible course of action. This so-called declaration of intentions has not yet, of course, been concurred in by MacArthur, but the Secretariat have confidence that the State Department and the Army, who have already agreed apparently to this arrangement, will succeed in making the General understand. You might wish to let us know of your own reaction to this communication by Mr. Kingsley to the Unified Command.

4. We may add that some of the strong feeling in the Secretariat had not only been due to what Mr. Kingsley had said in public, but to private information concerning the agreement reached between General MacArthur and Mr. Kingsley in Tokyo. Colonel Katzin, on the occasion of a visit to Hickerson of the State Department, was able to see a telegram which General MacArthur had sent to Washington, describing the agreement and expressing his complete confidence in Mr. Kingsley's understanding of the facts of life.

5. The fact that Kingsley started off badly was, of course, unfortunate. He had two strikes on him to begin with because of the way in which he had been sponsored for various positions by President Truman; and his disregard of UNKRA and his press releases have created a gulf between him and the Secretariat which might delay genuine cooperation. Strangely enough, some members of the Secretariat seemed to have enjoyed the difference of opinion and showed a tendency to magnify Mr. Kingsley's offences. This was particularly untimely when a sense of proportion was necessary.

6. There obviously cannot be established in Korea a relief agency which is entirely independent of military facilities. What seems to be required is a workable arrangement by which military facilities will be used to the best advantage, while the United Nations maintains control over the general political aspects of policy. To judge from his talk with Mr. Berlis as reported in your despatch No. V-587 of March 28,† Mr. Kingsley himself had tended to obscure the issue. By implying that those who differed from him were advocating an unrealistic separation, he almost ridiculed those who advocated a moderate solution along with those who were ignoring the exigencies of the situation. In our view his recent change of heart, if accepted by all, should do much towards eliminating the basic differences of approach and should help considerably in bringing this whole incident to a close.

7. You will recall that in my teletype under reference I mentioned that Sir Arthur Rucker will be passing through New York on his way to Korea. It has now been agreed further that Sir Arthur will probably need about a month in Korea to familiarize himself with the problems at hand and to hold the necessary consultations with the Korean authorities and the members of UNCURK. Upon his return to New York he will then officially meet with the members of the Advisory Committee and Mr. Kingsley will also come to New York for the occasion. Colonel Katzin was, however, unable to confirm whether Mr. Kingsley would remain in New York afterwards or whether he would abide by his original belief that the Korean relief operation could be run as efficiently from Geneva. We were actually given the impression that, in the opinion of the Secretariat, this is a matter which should be dealt with between Mr. Kingsley himself and the Advisory Committee. It may be now, in view of Sir Arthur's appointment, that Mr. Kingsley's residence either in New York or in Washington might not be as essential as before. You might wish to give further consideration to this problem and to let us know at your convenience whether we should still continue to insist that the Agent-General should establish his headquarters in some place other than Geneva.

8. Mention might be made in conclusion of two very unfortunate recent developments in the field of Korean relief. Both the Thai contribution in rice and the New Zealand contribution in wheat were spoiled and totally inedible on arrival in Korea. Both contributions were reported to have been dumped in the sea. It is not too surprising that facilities for shipment in Thailand were not good, but such carelessness on the part of the New Zealanders is somewhat harder to understand.

9. I am also enclosing in duplicate some material on Korea which has been kindly made available to us by the Australian Mission to the United Nations. I think that this documentation provides some useful and interesting supplementary information on the subject discussed in this despatch.

AGENT-GENERAL FOR KOREAN RELIEF

We have noted with considerable gratification the attitude which Mr. Kingsley is apparently prepared to adopt in regard to the status of UNKRA vis-à-vis the Unified Command. If he can succeed in having the military authorities agree to an equitable division of responsibility for relief operations in Korea along the lines proposed in his telegram of March 30,† I should think that most of the causes of our own dissatisfaction and that of other contributing countries would have been removed.

2. As you know, we have not been disposed to challenge the authority of the Unified Command to exercise control over certain phases of relief activities in Korea, so long as active military operations were being conducted in that country. At the same time, we could see no justification for the complete integration of all relief and rehabilitation agencies under the military command as implied in Mr. Kingsley's statement to the New York Times representative on March 10. The proposals now outlined by Mr. Kingsley in his telegram to the Unified Command would, you will agree, go a long way toward meeting our point of view. It would seem particularly desirable to us that certain functions, such as the provision of technical advice and assistance to the Korean Government and the initiation of rehabilitation activities in areas not now the scene of military operations, be assumed by UNKRA at this stage, so that the Agency might be well established in the field as and when the military situation permits a transition from military to civilian control. This, you will recall, figured prominently among the desiderata outlined by Mr. Plimsoll, the Australian representative on UNCURK, the substance of whose views was transmitted to you under cover of our despatch No. V-601 of March 30.†

3. In view of Mr. Kingsley's intention to have his Deputy, Sir Arthur Rucker, establish his headquarters in Korea and assume overall and direct responsibility for all phases of relief and rehabilitation operations in which the interests of the military authorities would not appear to be directly involved, I doubt if, for the time being, we should continue to insist too emphatically that Mr. Kingsley establish his operational headquarters in some place other than Geneva. With a competent Deputy in Korea and what we assume will be a more propitious atmosphere in Tokyo, there would no longer seem to be the same urgency for Mr. Kingsley's presence in either Korea or the United States until UNKRA can assume complete responsibility for the relief and rehabilitation programme in Korea.

4. In the light of these considerations, there is probably no immediate need to press for a meeting of the Advisory Committee to discuss the questions of (a) the relationship between UNKRA and the Unified Command, and (b) the proposed headquarters of the Agent-General. Nevertheless, there would be no harm in raising these questions if, as intimated in your teletype No. 364 of April 3,† an informal meeting is held during Sir Arthur Rucker's stay in New York. The firm support of the members of the Advisory Committee for Mr. Kingsley's latest proposals to the United Command might well be required to ensure the acceptance and eventual implementation of these proposals.

PROPOSED PROGRAMME FOR UNKRA

Following from Under-Secretary, Begins: We understand that the Advisory Committee of UNKRA is meeting on May 23 and that Pollock has already given you the preliminary views of the Department of Finance on the Agent-General's proposed programme for the twelve-month period ending June 30, 1952.

2. As you know, Kingsley visited Ottawa on May 17 in his dual capacity as Director-General of IRO and Agent-General for Korean Relief. He had an interview with the Minister from which the following emerged as the salient points:

(a) He expressed warm appreciation for the Canadian contribution of $7.25 million which, as the only cash contribution to date, had been "very helpful". This confirms your view that our contribution and our representations have made our voice one which is listened to in UNKRA councils;

(b) Kingsley outlined a fresh agreement recently negotiated with General Ridgway. Under its terms, UNKRA is to function with complete independence in the technical assistance field, but will continue to distribute supplies under UNCAC [sic]. Kingsley regarded this as a realistic compromise, while admitting that the situation was difficult because of the presence of an army-in-being;

(c) He briefly outlined the twelve-month programme to go into effect on July 1. He stressed that the emphasis was on reconstruction rather than on relief, but added that the programme could be put forward from "quarter to quarter" if the need arose, thereby inferring that its implementation was heavily dependent upon the changing phases of the Korean war;

(d) Kingsley proposed shortly to establish a procurement office for UNKRA in Canada;

(e) Kingsley hopes to secure the assistance of the Department in obtaining the services of a Canadian as Assistant Agent-General for Korean relief (i.e., the number three man) with headquarters probably in New York.

3. The total impression received from the interview, despite the outlines of fresh agreements and programmes, was that Kingsley was to some extent whistling in the dark. There appeared to be an undercurrent of slightly cynical fatigue running through his talk, as if in acknowledgment of the difficulties of implementing his plans with any success so long as the present phase of the Korean war continues. (It is possible that the Minister may wish to add to or modify this summary of the interview, and any comments which he may have to make will be sent to you immediately by telegram.)

4. We would suggest that, at the meeting of the Advisory Committee, you make the following points:

(a) The desirability of the maximum independence of UNKRA from the Unified Command which may be consistent with the military situation;

(b) The hope that the Canadian contribution will be used for procurement rather than administrative costs, and that, though the gift is untied, some proportion of it may be spent on Canadian commodities;

(c) While we cannot criticize in detail the Agent-General's programme, it seems to us that, as a matter of broad principle, there is a danger of too much emphasis being placed at this time on long-range rather than short-term projects.

5. I believe you are aware that Finance attaches particular importance to the necessity for co-ordination in the field and the avoidance of duplication of effort amongst the various agencies working in Korea.

DESPATCH 500 New York, May 24, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

Reference: My despatch No. 491 of May 22, 1951,† and previous correspondence.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE TO UNKRA

1. The Advisory Committee to UNKRA met again yesterday to elect a chairman, to complete its examination of the financial regulations for UNKRA, and to consider the Proposed Programme and Plan of Expenditure of UNKRA, as outlined by the Agent-General in his document of May 11, 1951.

2. Following receipt of your teletype No. 370 of May 22,† we explained to the U.K. and U.S. representatives our inability to accept the chairmanship of the Committee. Mr. Corley Smith of the U.K. agreed with Dr. Lubin that it was doubtful whether Uruguay could be a suitable chairman for such a Committee; they thought, on the other hand, that the election of India to the post could easily prove embarrassing, since she had so far found it impossible to contribute to the Korean programme; and secondly, in view of India's general attitude towards the Korean question. In the light of this situation the U.S. representative withdrew his objection to having the representative of a great power as chairman of the Committee, and Mr. Corley Smith was unanimously elected chairman.

3. The Committee then considered the text of the financial regulations as revised at its meeting of Monday, May 21. The Committee confirmed the decision reached at its previous meeting that these draft regulations were now effective on a provisional basis, subject to final concurrence by the Secretary-General and the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions. A copy of the revised financial regulations† is attached for your information.

4. The Proposed Programme and Plan of Expenditure of UNKRA was introduced by Mr. Kingsley. We had previously been told, on a confidential basis, that this Programme had been prepared mainly for the purpose of convincing the U.S. Congress of the urgent need for funds for UNKRA, and of the magnitude of the task ahead. This explained the emphasis in the Programme on long-term projects and its somewhat unrealistic approach in the light of the present situation in Korea. The U.K. authorities had, in fact, been disturbed by the scale and the lavishness of the Plan outlined in this document of May 11, 1951, prepared by Mr. Kingsley, and Mr. Corley Smith had been instructed to explain at the meeting of the Advisory Committee the misgivings of his government about such a Plan. Mr. Kingsley's introductory remarks, however, succeeded in dissipating whatever apprehensions the members of the Committee might have had about the scope of the proposed Programme. Mr. Kingsley made it clear that the Plan had been drafted on the assumption that it would ultimately be possible to carry out in Korea a full programme of relief, rehabilitation and reconstruction. He pointed out that the implementation of such a plan at the moment was, of course, impossible, and that this document should be looked upon only as a maximum framework within which the Agency might, at a later date, be called upon to operate. For the time being, the activities of the Agency would be limited, and probably confined to technical assistance and to such emergency relief as might be of assistance to the military authorities.

5. The organization of the Agency's administrative services would, therefore, proceed only on a scale appropriate to the tasks which may be implemented now. There will be an office in Pusan under the direction of General Lloyd from Australia; a liaison office would be established in Tokyo under the direction of a retired Major General from the U.S. Army. Other liaison and procurement offices would be set up as the need arose. There would, of course, be an immediate need for an office in New York, one in Washington and one in Geneva, where accounts would be handled, since Mr. Kingsley himself would be remaining in Geneva for some time to come. Mr. Kingsley estimated that the setting up of the required administrative machinery, including the purchasing of a certain number of trucks and jeeps, and the construction of a suitable house in Pusan, would cost approximately between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000.

6. Mr. Kingsley's remarks about the nature of the future activities of the Agency and about its relationship with the Unified Command would appear to have been similar to those which he made in Ottawa on the occasion of his recent visit. He seemed well convinced now of the necessity of having an Agency independent from the Unified Command, to the extent that it does not conflict with the military operations; he mentioned the agreement which was recently worked out between Sir Arthur Rucker and General Ridgway, the text of which is at present under consideration in Washington by the officials of the Unified Command. He did not hide the fact that the operations of the Agency in Korea would have to be handled very carefully so long as the military campaign continued. It was natural, he said, for the Unified Command to insist that the operations of the Agency should not interfere in any way with the conduct of the war.

7. After various comments by the members of the Committee it was agreed that the Proposed Programme and Plan of Expenditure, as submitted by Mr. Kingsley in the document dated May 11, 1951, would be placed "on ice", and that the Agency would actually be operating on the basis of periodical programmes approved by the Committee, and which will have been submitted by the Agent-General as their implementation appeared practicable. Attached for your information are two copies of the text† of the resolution which the Committee approved unanimously, and which will now enable the Agency to begin operating. This resolution met the wishes of the Agent-General satisfactorily, and at the same time, we thought, safeguarded the right of the Advisory Committee to exercise a closed control over the "quarter to quarter" programmes on which the Agency would actually be operating in Korea.

8. In the course of the discussion on the Proposed Programme, the U.K. representative made a statement concerning the U.K. contribution which was, we thought, a little disturbing. We are reporting on this point in a separate communication.

9. Upon adjourning, the Committee agreed that the next meeting of the Committee should be tentatively scheduled to be held in Geneva, either during or shortly after the Thirteenth Session of ECOSOC. It was pointed out that the activities of UNKRA would be on the agenda of ECOSOC, and that all the members of the Committee were members of the Council.

10. I might add that in the course of the general debate, I made the various points outlined in paragraphs 4 and 5 of your teletype no. 371 of May 22. As indicated in previous communications to you, these various points had already been mentioned informally to the Secretariat, as well as to Sir Arthur Rucker. In order to make point B of paragraph 4 of your teletype, I thought it best to generalize the comment to a request that quite apart from the question of spending contributions made in soft currency, it was desirable that the agency would spread its procurement of supplies as broadly as possible. I made it clear that what we had in mind was the spending of the Canadian contribution as much as possible in Canada, but in view of the fact that the Advisory Committee is so very small and is intended to act as trustee for all the United Nations, I hesitated to state what might have been looked upon as a bad example by using it as a forum in which to put forward a request purely on behalf of our own government. Mr. Kingsley said that he knew exactly what I was driving at and would endeavour to see that this request was carried out in so far as possible.

11. I am reporting in a separate despatch† on the openings which might be available in UNKRA for Canadian nationals.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO KOREAN RELIEF

1. There was one aspect of yesterday's meeting of the United Nations Advisory Committee on UNKRA which was not included in our report in despatch No. 500, as I wished to deal with it separately.

2. In outlining his short term intentions, Mr. Kingsley's emphasis was on gradual expansion, on a more or less ad hoc basis, as circumstances permitted. He was anxious to indicate to the Committee that he did not intend to spend all the funds available as soon as possible in a grandiose establishment which might be needed at a later stage but which was not appropriate for the present interim period. In outlining this approach, he implied that it might be possible to make drawings from government contributions by stages.

3. This point made by Mr. Kingsley was picked up by the United Kingdom Representative, Mr. Corley Smith, who was under instructions to make an explanation about the United Kingdom contribution. Mr. Corley Smith, in referring to the principle enunciated by the Agent General, said that although the United Kingdom Government intended to proceed with the appropriation of ten million pounds as promised, they would not release the full amount immediately. They would release a certain amount for the interim program but could not make the full contribution available until they had an opportunity to study and approve the long range plans for post-hostilities operations and consider the circumstances in which these would be implemented.

4. This was the first time I had heard of these intentions on the part of the United Kingdom, and it seemed to me they had disturbing implications. I pointed out therefore that although I liked the Agent General's emphasis on gradual expansion and the use of funds only as necessity determined, nevertheless the situation was thereby complicated for countries which had already made their full contributions. I thought it necessary to point out that the size of our contribution, like that of all countries, was determined by the calculation of what seemed our fair share in relation to contributions promised by other countries. If a general principle were to be established by which subsequent contributions were to be in stages, with the possible implication that they might not eventually be paid in full, then the early contributors would have paid more than their share. It seemed to me furthermore that the establishment of such a principle would have a demoralizing effect on contributors. We would probably have hesitated ourselves to pay the full amount at the beginning. Nevertheless the Canadian contribution, coming at the time when it did, had been of crucial importance to the Agency. It seemed to me that the Agency, if it were to make any rational plans for operation, would need quickly further contributions in full from other governments.

5. Mr. Corley Smith, who was, I think, somewhat embarrassed by his instructions, proceeded to go into a further explanation of the intentions of the United Kingdom. I was anxious not to be drawn into a bilateral argument with the United Kingdom Representative on the policy of his government in a forum of this kind, and I emphasized therefore that my intention was not to criticise one member but to oppose the recognition of a general principle of contributions in stages, at least without further consideration. The United States Representative, who seemed somewhat embarrassed by this discussion, concluded by pointing out that the prompt Canadian contribution in full had not only been important to the Agency but had also had a strong moral effect. In particular it was of very great value to the United States Administration in securing an appropriation from Congress. He touched on a vital point when he referred to the faith in the Agency which had been shown by the Canadian Government.

6. After the meeting Mr. Crepault and I discussed this subject further with Mr. Corley Smith. Mr. Corley Smith recognized our difficult position, and I think that he was not very happy about his instructions, but he indicated that there was nothing he could do about them. He said frankly that the reason for this policy was that the United Kingdom did not wish to be committed to a large contribution until they had seen a feasible plan of which they approved. Their attitude seems to be conditioned by considerable skepticism about proposals which Mr. Kingsley might make. Frankly he said that they were adopting this policy as a means of putting pressure on the Agency to be sensible. He did not think, however, that we had any serious reason to be disturbed, because we knew that the United Kingdom always fulfilled her obligations and that the money would be paid. I said that this was not really the point. The United Kingdom in fact was claiming a right which other countries did not claim. If they did not approve of the Agency's plans, they had a right to express their views and attempt to alter these plans in the Advisory Committee. What was unwarranted, however, was to attach financial pressure and to presume to influence the policy of the Agency by withholding funds. Although this might seem to be a reasonable principle when only one government was concerned, it was a principle which would make international activities of this kind impossible.

7. I should be grateful for your views on this subject. If you consider that the view which I adopted was unnecessary, I could easily explain our position, as I made it clear that I was expressing only personal and preliminary views. I was particularly anxious to challenge the U.K. policy in view of your instruction to ask that the Canadian contribution be spent for procurement rather than on administration costs. While presumably a certain proportion of all contributions must be spent on administration, the acceptance of the U.K. principle might well mean that the Canadian contribution would to a large extent be used for initial administration costs. If you agree that the United Kingdom attitude is unsound, you may wish to consider discussing this subject in London. My impression is that the policy decision was taken in London without an appreciation of the effects of such a policy on ourselves in particular and on the general work of the Agency. (Mr. Corley Smith and Sir Arthur Rucker implied that it was the work of the Treasury.) We have gone, I think, about as far as we can in the Advisory Committee by questioning this principle. From the comments of Mr. Lubin and Mr. Kingsley, I am sure they will do what they can to discourage the general adoption of the principle of withholding funds. The matter had, I think, been thrashed out between Mr. Kingsley and the United Kingdom authorities when he was in London, and his general comments on this subject were intended to imply his perfunctory acceptance of what the United Kingdom were determined to do. Neither the Advisory Committee nor the Negotiating Committee could presumably interfere with the right of the United Kingdom to make a contribution in whatever form it wishes. Nevertheless, if the second most important contributor does adopt this attitude, the effect on other contributors could be unfortunate. The effect might also be felt in subsequent programs of a similar nature. I should think it might very well inhibit the Canadian Government from making prompt payments in the future.

UNKRA AND THE FINANCING OF INTERNATIONAL RELIEF AGENCIES

You will recall that in my Despatch No. V-2202 of May 30, 1951,† I drew your attention to the proposal made by the United Kingdom representative at a meeting of the United Nations Korean Advisory Committee on May 23 that his Government release its contribution to UNKRA by stages, dependent upon study and approval of the long-range plans for the rehabilitation of Korea. We informed you of our misgivings concerning the United Kingdom attitude, including the likelihood that it would make other governments reluctant to furnish prompt payments in the future, and we asked you to secure the views of the United Kingdom authorities.

2. In your despatch under reference you informed us of talks which you had had with Williams of the United Kingdom Treasury and Scopes of the United Nations (Economic and Social) Department of the Foreign Office, who explained that their proposal to withhold contributions to UNKRA did not represent the initiation of a general policy towards international organizations and agencies, but arose out of the particular situation in Korea. These officials also expressed "some surprise" at our interpretation of their policy and you yourself suggested that the United Kingdom did not, in fact, intend to exert financial pressure on UNKRA but was rather exercising extreme caution in view of the uncertainty surrounding the future of the Agency's operations.

3. In the light of your despatch we were not wholly satisfied that the United Kingdom authorities had foreseen all the implications of such an attitude. It appears to us that while they might think UNKRA a special case, the position taken by them would inevitably be used as an excuse by other governments when the question of contributions to other agencies arose. The Department of Finance shares our views, and its misgivings as to the prospects for the successful financing of international agencies have, of course, been greatly reinforced by the recent action of the House Foreign Affairs Committee of the United States Congress in reducing the United States contribution to UNKRA by $101,250,000. We should therefore be grateful if you would re-open the matter with the United Kingdom authorities on a more formal basis, reporting our doubts and seeking, if possible, some reassurance as to their long-term plans in this field.

4. Perhaps the most disturbing aspect of both the United Kingdom and United States attitudes is that they depart from the spirit in which contributions were pledged in the Negotiating Committee, and may thus make future international cooperation in this and related fields very difficult. In the case of the United Kingdom, their intermittent payment of contributions, even though they have indicated that they will ultimately honour their pledge, opens the way to serious difficulties. We can, of course, agree with their desire for the development of a sound and economical programme and we have already stressed the necessity for such a programme in ECOSOC, the General Assembly and the Korean Advisory Committee, but it seems to us that if each government were to decide to set its own standards of performance before releasing its contribution, it would lead to a situation in which the Agency would be unable to rely on a regular flow of funds without direct consultation with each large contributor involving, no doubt, undesirable pressures.

5. Will you please make these views known to the United Kingdom authorities. In doing so, you should point out that the United Kingdom, through its membership in ECOSOC, the General Assembly and the Korean Advisory Committee, is well able to exert a direct and continuing influence on the development of the programme. By refusing to make full use of these appropriate forces and by making an individual decision to curtail the flow of funds, the United Kingdom's action may well lead other governments to withhold payment of their contributions. You will readily understand that if this were to occur, the responsibility for financing such essential relief operations would fall directly on the shoulders of those who have provided the funds: in this case, Canada. It seems to us that the line between "exercising extreme caution", and the actual withholding of funds is a very thin one indeed.

6. It will, of course, be amply evident to you that if the United States contribution is in fact finally reduced by the amount mentioned, it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to convince Cabinet and Parliament of the value to Canada of participation in future projects of this nature. We are therefore inclined to attach importance to the attitude of the United Kingdom.[67]

DESPATCH 2827 Washington, September 7, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

UNKRA AND THE FINANCING OF INTERNATIONAL RELIEF AGENCIES

1. As you know, the U.S. Administration included in their proposed Mutual Security Program for the fiscal year 1952, which was presented to the Congress, a request that $112.5 million be authorized and appropriated to help meet the U.S. contribution pledged to UNKRA. In addition, the proposed legislation contemplated authority to use unexpended funds, previously appropriated for economic assistance to Korea to the Economic Cooperation Administration, totalling $50 million. The total of these sums, if authorized and appropriated, would meet the United States commitment of $162.5 million for approximately the first year of UNKRA operations in Korea. It is, however, significant to note that in presenting their proposals, the Executive Branch pointed out that U.S. contributions of major amounts would be forthcoming only when agreement had been reached that UNKRA should assume full responsibility for relief and rehabilitation operations in Korea.

2. During the initial Hearings before the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Administration witnesses admitted that it was unlikely that anything like the total amount requested from Congress as the U.S. contribution would be spent by UNKRA in the current fiscal year. Subsequently, the House, following a recommendation of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, voted that authority be granted to the Administration to utilize $11,250,000 of new funds in addition to the unexpended funds appropriated to E.C.A. for economic assistance to Korea. It was recognized that the pipeline of U.S. supplies which would be in existence when UNKRA took over the relief and economic assistance operations in Korea would also be available. The House Committee and the House as a whole recognized that this sum represented only a downpayment and the House Committee report specifically pointed out that "the United States has responsibilities in this area and is prepared to consider further action at the appropriate time".

[67] Une dépêche semblable, numéro V-2823, a été envoyée à Washington le 29 août 1951.
A similar despatch, numbered V-2823, was sent to Washington on August 29, 1951.

3. The Senate, in considering the Mutual Security Act, had before it a recommendation of its joint Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees to the effect that $75,750,000 should be authorized in the fiscal year 1951-52 as a U.S. contribution to UNKRA. In addition, the Senate Committees recommended that authority be granted to transfer the $50 million previously authorized for E.C.A. purposes in Korea to help meet the UNKRA commitment of the United States. In this respect, the Senate Committees' report makes the following comment: "Since there will be a substantial carry-over of unexpended funds already appropriated for economic assistance to Korea by E.C.A. and from the pipeline of United States financed relief, it is believed that the authorization herein provided (i.e. $75,750,000) will be sufficient to meet the United States share in the United Nations program."

4. In acting on the Senate Committees' report the Senate as a whole, as an economy measure, voted a $6 million reduction in the funds to be appropriated to Korea. Thus, a House-Senate Conference Committee will convene about mid-September to iron out the differences between the House and Senate version of the Mutual Security Act, the House having recommended that not more than $11,250,000 of new funds be contributed to UNKRA, and the Senate not more than $69,750,000. Both the House and Senate agree that the $50 million formerly appropriated to E.C.A. for its Korean operations could be transferred to UNKRA. It is, of course, obvious that the Conference Committee cannot recommend as a U.S. contribution to UNKRA in the current fiscal year an amount greater than that approved by the Senate. It is also significant to note that in presenting the joint Senate Committees' report to the Senate, Senator Connally, the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, pointed out that the joint Committees had approved the authorization "with the thought that an appropriation will probably not be necessary at this session of Congress".

5. With this background information in mind, we discussed the problems raised in your despatch under reference with Joseph Carwell of the Far Eastern Affairs Section in the State Department. We pointed out that in the first place, the Administration itself, in its presentation to Congress, in effect, had recommended that the major part of the U.S. contribution should not be made to UNKRA until the agency was in a position to assume full responsibility for relief and rehabilitation operations in Korea. Moreover, the cuts imposed by the House and Senate in the authorizing legislation, and the possibility that no new appropriations will be available, might be interpreted by foreign observers as a lessening of the U.S. interest in the proposed operations of UNKRA. In any event, the fact that the major contributor proposed to dole out its contribution to UNKRA would make future multilateral action in this and related fields extremely difficult. It would be particularly difficult for us to justify the full Canadian payment which, on the basis of present prospects, will be quite out of proportion to the total amounts to be contributed in the near future.

6. In reply, Carwell pointed out that at the time UNKRA was established and the U.S. contribution assessed, it seemed probable that the Agency could begin full operations without too much delay. At that time, the U.S. Administration had even considered seeking from Congress a special appropriation to meet the U.S. commitment. It had, however, soon become apparent that UNKRA could not begin full-scale operations in Korea for some time and that in the interim the responsibilities of the Unified Command for relief and short-term economic aid would be paramount. At the time the Administration was preparing its Mutual Security Program, the Defence Department was seeking special appropriations for civilian relief in Korea and, indeed, $50 million was appropriated for this purpose in January (the Department of Defence is seeking another $50 million for similar purposes at the present time). The Administration did not feel that it could honestly support, without prejudice to the more vital requirements under the Mutual Security Program and the appropriations sought by the Department of Defence, the full contribution to UNKRA in the current fiscal year, particularly as the sums contributed could not be utilized by the Agency. Thus, in view of the short-term operations of the U.S. Military in this field, they believed it would be useful to make some commitment to Congress to the effect that major contributions would not be made until UNKRA was prepared to assume full responsibility for relief and rehabilitation. He recalled that the cuts in the Administration's programme imposed by the Congress were not restricted to the U.S. contribution to UNKRA. With respect to UNKRA however, the Congressional cuts were based on the fact that the money could not be spent in any event, and the Administration, without prejudicing other parts of the Mutual Security Program, was not in a position to offer more than token resistance. Despite the suggestion by Senator Connally that appropriations would be unnecessary, the Administration will seek appropriations to the full extent of the amount authorized. Carwell said that it had been made unmistakably clear by the Congressional committees that the sums authorized represented only a downpayment and that the U.S. commitment to make its full contribution was unaffected. Carwell also emphasized that the State Department would be prepared to request from Congress the full amount of the U.S. contribution whenever it believed such a request would be met by the Congress and certainly as soon as the U.S. contribution could be made use of by UNKRA.

7. We thanked Carwell for these assurances, pointing out that we were not questioning the ability or the desire of the United States Government to fulfill its pledges to UNKRA. Rather, our concern was with the method by which the United States was apparently prepared to meet its contribution, the establishment of this method as a principle of making contributions to international organizations such as UNKRA, and our particular concern in that the Canadian Government had made its full contribution, a contribution which would now be out of proportion to the total amounts which might be contributed in the near future.

8. Carwell stressed that the full Canadian contribution had been a great help to the Administration in appearing before Congressional committees. He said that our full contribution, in addition to the representations with which he fully sympathized, would be of assistance to the Administration in the Hearings before the appropriation committees.

UNKRA AND THE FINANCING OF INTERNATIONAL RELIEF AGENCIES

In accordance with your instructions we re-opened on a more formal basis the question of United Kingdom policy concerning contributions to UNKRA and wrote the United Nations (Economic and Social) Department of the Foreign Office expressing the views contained in your despatch under reference. We have now had a talk with Dudley, Head of this Department of the Foreign Office, and can report with greater precision the United Kingdom position.

2. Dudley began by saying that he had a good deal of sympathy for the point of view expressed in our approach to the Foreign Office, and recognized that the problem of contributions to UNKRA was of importance to us both because of its general implications and because Canada had promptly paid its pledged contribution at the outset. But he felt that it was important, in understanding the United Kingdom position, to recall both the history of events in Korea and the background of the negotiations which had taken place between UNKRA and the Unified Command. He recalled that the General Assembly Resolution had been passed at a time when United Nations forces were pushing the Communist forces up the peninsula, and when the end of hostilities in Korea appeared to be in sight, with the prospect of the early implementation of relief and reconstruction measures applicable to Korea as a whole. These hopes were subsequently belied by military developments and the scope and character of the relief programme originally envisaged was affected as a result.

3. From Dudley's subsequent exposition of the United Kingdom attitude there appear to be two main reasons for the caution which the United Kingdom has been exercising with respect to its contribution to UNKRA. The most important one is the uncertainty surrounding the whole question of the Agency's actual programme of operations in Korea. Dudley has pointed out that there was a delay of six months between the General Assembly resolution setting up the Agency and the conclusion of an agreement with the Unified Command allowing the Agency to commence work in Korea. Even then that agreement constituted only a partial authorization for limited purposes and provided for a form of technical assistance to South Korea rather than for the full-scale relief and reconstruction work originally envisaged by the Assembly for the whole of Korea. It is true that Mr. Kingsley contends that the approval which the Korean Advisory Committee gave to his report on May 23rd constituted full authorization for the proposed UNKRA programme of $250 million. In Dudley's view, however, this contention is without foundation since the Advisory Committee did not have the power to give such authorization and since the total amount of this programme had never received formal approval (as is reflected in the fact that the United Kingdom contribution was pledged on a sliding scale: £10 million for a total programme of $250 million and £8 million for a total of $200 million). In any case conditions in Korea itself render it impossible at the moment to draw up long-term relief plans, due to the uncertainty attendant on the truce negotiations. If large-scale fighting is renewed, the relief eventually required will probably be greater than was originally planned. On the other hand, it is likely that such relief will be confined to South Korea and may in this respect be more restricted than was envisaged in the original resolution. Because of the difficulties referred to above, UNKRA had not been able to carry out the general programme covering the period up to early 1952 envisaged by the Assembly's resolution. The current need was therefore to arrive at the formulation of the revised longer-term programme for Korea, and this would have to be tackled at the next Assembly.

4. The United Kingdom authorities therefore argue that in these uncertain circumstances it is not unreasonable to make their contribution available as the money can be spent, reserving payment of the full amount pledged until a full-scale relief plan can be drawn up and approved. In the meantime they have made £250,000 available and have pointed out to the Agent-General that a further £400,000 of the total of £10 million authorized by Parliament for the period ending March 31st, 1952 is in the form of a direct contribution to the United Nations, which the Secretary-General can spend at any time.

5. A second reason for caution, which has not been expressed in so many words but seems to underlie the United Kingdom attitude, is a certain concern lest the Agent-General might use funds available now to build up a formidable administrative machinery before the eventual shape of UNKRA's work can be clearly seen. The United Kingdom authorities feel that Mr. Kingsley is in any case too susceptible to the attractions of a large establishment and are apparently unwilling to put more temptation in his way than is necessary for the limited needs of this interim period.

6. We drew Dudley's attention to our concern that the cautious policy the United Kingdom has been following because of the special circumstances in this particular case might have disturbing implications with respect to the successful financing of international agencies if it were given general application. Dudley has given a categorical assurance, however, that it is not their intention to apply such a policy to other operations in this general field. Further, in the case of Korean relief, when it becomes possible to formulate a long-term relief programme in Korea, the United Kingdom will not be backward in providing its fair share of the contributions required.

7. Although they both have disturbing aspects for us, I think you will agree that it is necessary to draw a distinction between the matter of the United Kingdom contribution and the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the United States contribution. In the latter case the question involved is the total amount of the United States contribution and, if the recent reduction made by the House Foreign Affairs Committee of Congress is not restored, the United States will not be able to contribute the amount promised by the Administration. In the case of the United Kingdom, however, the amount promised has already been approved by Parliament and the only question is the rate at which it is to be spent.

8. You may also be interested to know that Dudley has been giving some preliminary thought to the discussion of Korean relief at the forthcoming session of the General Assembly. In his view one of the most important questions with which the Assembly will have to deal is the relation of UNCURK with UNKRA. He believes that, when conditions in Korea allow a full-scale relief programme to be undertaken, it will be both desirable and necessary that there be only one United Nations body in Korea to deal with it. This might be accomplished by making UNKRA the operating Agency in Korea and by withdrawing UNCURK from Korea and perhaps merging it with the Advisory Committee. Dudley emphasized, however, that these were not more than personal thoughts at this stage.

DESPATCH 392 Geneva, September 20, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

ADVISORY COMMITTEE OF UNKRA

During the 13th Session of the Economic and Social Council (September 1951) the Advisory Committee, United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, met in Geneva under the chairmanship of Mr. G.T. Corley Smith of the United Kingdom. The United States was represented by Mr. Isador Lubin, Head of the U.S.A. Delegation to ECOSOC. Delegates from India and Uruguay attended, and Canada was represented by Mr. James Sinclair, M.P., Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance, Miss B.M. Meagher of the Department of External Affairs, and Mr.

N.F.H. Berlis of the Canadian Permanent Delegation to the United Nations, Geneva.

2. At a preliminary meeting held for purely informational purposes, the Agent General, Mr. Kingsley who had recently returned from a trip to Korea, made a lengthy and very impressive statement describing conditions there, the present status of UNKRA operations, and possible long-term projects. He painted a most depressing picture of the situation in Korea and informed the Committee that, while valid statistics were next to impossible to obtain, his personal estimate was that South Korea has suffered about a two billion dollar loss in capital goods. He emphasized the fact that no loss of this magnitude would be made up directly by international assistance and urged that we should not merely attempt in Korea "a dreary task of relief" but that "we must so develop our programme and so utilize our resources that the Korean people themselves experience a sort of renaissance with all of the cultural, social and economic creativity implied in the term". Two copies of the text of Mr. Kingsley's statement are attached as Annex 1† to this despatch.

3. One of the most important items on the agenda was the question of initial long range programmes which might be undertaken by UNKRA. The programmes discussed were the following:

(1) Teaching hospital and revival of medical education
(2) Draught cattle project
(3) Coastal vessel programme
(4) Vocational training centres
(5) Medical rehabilitation
(6) Housing

It was explained by the Agent General that no approval for any of these projects had yet been given by the military authorities, but he was anxious to have the advice of the Committee so that negotiations could proceed. The only item not included in the original $250 million programme was that relating to coastal vessels, as it was originally thought that it would be necessary to use exclusively the military pipe line. The Agent General indicated that in his view the draught cattle project and the coastal vessel programme are particularly important.

4. With respect to medical education, the Agent General explained that an integrated and comprehensive health programme is being developed in cooperation with WHO, but that arising out of a proposal of the Danish Government a narrower project is being considered to establish a Scandinavian Teaching Hospital in Seoul in connection with the Faculty of Medicine of Seoul University. It is expected that this project would be financed partly by contributions from the Scandinavian Governments, partly by the ROK Government, and the balance by UNKRA. Budget estimates have not yet been worked out.

5. The draught cattle project envisages the importation of 20,500 working cattle and approximately 1,000 breeding cattle over a three year period. It is hoped to obtain 500 working cattle in the near future, 10,000 during 1952, and the balance in 1953. Half the breeding cattle would be imported from Pakistan in the spring of 1952. A quarantine station would be rehabilitated, a new station and agricultural experiment center constructed, and six smaller stations developed.

6. This programme would not cost over $100,000 in 1951, but is expected to exceed two million dollars in 1952 and again in 1953.

7. To assist in expanding the Korean merchant marine, the Agent General is anxious to obtain five coastal cargo vessels (type CI-MAV-I) to be operated by the Korean Shipping Company. These ships would be of about 5,000 deadweight tons and carry up to 5,000 tons of cargo. They would be of shallow draft to permit use in small Korean harbours, and although they would be too small for use in trans-Pacific runs, they would, according to shipping experts, be ideal for trips between Korea and Japan or even between Korea and the Philippines. The total cost of this project would be between three and four million dollars.

8. The Agent General pointed out that implementation of the coastal vessel programme would assist the reconstruction of the Korean economy, would impress the Korean officials and people, and would be a source of revenue for the Korean Government. This project would also permit the import of consumer goods and UNKRA supplies independent of military channels.

9. With respect to vocational training, the Agent General explained that there is not sufficient skilled manpower in Korea to carry out a large scale reconstruction programme and a labour force must therefore be built up as rapidly as possible. This project is to be started immediately by the opening of two demonstration training centres to train Korean instructors and the Koreans themselves will then open other centres for the training of the general population. At least one of the demonstration centres should be in operation by the beginning of 1952.

10. The Agent General explained that nothing is being done at the present time for the medical rehabilitation of civilians, including a large number of amputees as a result of war injuries. It is, therefore, proposed that UNKRA should begin to provide medical rehabilitation facilities and in conjunction with this programme a small industry for the manufacture of artificial limbs would be developed.

11. Housing, of course, is a desperately serious problem in Korea for it is estimated that 600,000 houses have so far been destroyed and additional losses are occurring daily. UNKRA is not yet in a position to make any substantial contribution to the alleviation of this situation but plans are being made to hold a design competition for both rural and urban housing open to Korean architects and engineers. It is hoped that in this manner Korean talent may be developed and greater interest in the project aroused which will be of long term value.

12. In connection with this problem, Mr. Kingsley mentioned the need for emergency housing for the large number of unaccompanied children among the refugees. Of the estimated total of 100,000 such children, an undetermined number of whom are orphans, approximately 50% are being sheltered in orphanages and other institutions and plans are being discussed for the importation, in collaboration with UNICEF, of prefabricated housing from Yugoslavia. This matter is still in the initial planning stage and no definite project was put forward by the Agent General at this meeting of the Advisory Committee.

13. There was general agreement in the Committee that all projects mentioned by the Agent General would be of value although the United States Delegate had some reservations concerning the coastal vessel scheme and requested more details to be presented to the next meeting of the Committee. The Indian Delegate did not have instructions from his Government with respect to the coastal vessel project and he too suggested that a decision on this matter be postponed until the next meeting. The Agent General will continue to give the matter consideration and will provide the Committee with more detailed information at a future date.

14. During the course of discussion concerning long range programmes the Canadian Delegate expressed the view that the draught cattle project and medical rehabilitation might be given highest priority as they appeared to be the easiest projects to begin and would have an immediate impact on the Korean people.

15. Having provided this guidance for the Agent General with respect to long range programmes, the Committee then considered personnel and administrative problems. The Agent General presented a gloomy picture with respect to personnel recruitment, for out of 50 persons presently employed with the Civil Assistance Command 40 contracts will expire before the end of the year and the other 10 soon after that time. Indications are that more than half of these persons will wish to leave Korea and within the next few months UNKRA will need from 50 to 75 persons, including medical officers, supplies officers and sanitary experts. There is a particular need for top level people and as an example of the difficulties encountered, the Agent General explained that he was looking for a first class economic expert to lead economic programming; but out of 50 names so far supplied no one had accepted the position. Attempts are being made to recruit through specialized agencies and by direct approaches to governments but so far the results are very disappointing.

16. The Agent General explained that recruiting for service in Korea is difficult because of the depressing conditions in that country including lack of housing and sanitation and the impossibility of being accompanied by dependents.

17. The representative of the United States wondered whether an appeal to governments in the form of a resolution by the Advisory Committee might be helpful. The Canadian Delegate expressed the view, however, that direct approaches to appropriate governments by the Agent General might be as effective as a resolution and it was eventually agreed that a resolution should not be adopted. Members of the Committee undertook to bring to the attention of their respective governments the seriousness of the problem faced by the Agent General in the hope that sincere efforts will be made to make available to him the names of appropriate persons who might be prepared to accept employment with UNKRA.

18. Under this item of the agenda, the Committee considered the distribution by nationality of international personnel employed by UNKRA and it was learned that out of a total of 67 persons, 22 come from the U.S.A., 15 from Denmark, 14 from the United Kingdom, 5 from Canada and smaller numbers from other countries. It was pointed out that there was a shortage of Asians and South Americans but the Canadian Delegate expressed the view that, although the figures were of interest, the question of distribution by nationality must remain of secondary importance so long as recruiting difficulties were as serious as had been described by the Agent General.

19. Of the administrative problems, the chief one concerned the location of UNKRA headquarters. The United States, supported by the United Kingdom, suggested that the Agent General should make public a statement of intention to transfer the headquarters to Korea as soon as practicable. The Canadian Delegate informed the Committee that Canada was also anxious that the headquarters should be established in Korea and he welcomed any suggestion which would indicate progress towards that end.

20. The Agent General, however, pointed out certain practical difficulties which had to be faced with respect to this problem. The points which he mentioned were the following:

(1) The Agent General could not spend full time or even most of his time in Korea for he was required at meetings in New York, Geneva and elsewhere, and must travel extensively to visit governments;

(2) The United Nations High Command will not provide facilities for staff, and the persons who must be in Korea are living in insufferably crowded and unhygienic quarters;

(3) An announcement which implied that all UNKRA staff would be located in Korea would seriously affect recruiting which is already a difficult problem;

(4) The Korean economy and supply lines are already strained and it would not be sensible to aggravate that situation by unnecessarily creating conditions which would require additional housing, schools, commissary services, etc.

(5) The Agent General appreciated the political problems involved, but in view of the practical difficulties he was reluctant to use his organization as "a political front for something we won't be able to carry out".

21. The Agent General also claimed that he did not fully understand what governments meant by the term "headquarters". If headquarters were in the place where most of the staff were located, he could point out that out of a total personnel of 67 persons, 41 are located at Pusan. If headquarters were in the country where the most senior officials were located, out of the six highest ranking UNKRA officials, four are in Korea full time and the deputy Agent General has full authority to deal with the Korean Government. If headquarters are where the Agent General is, the Agent General has spent a third of his time in Korea during the past year.

22. The Canadian Representative said that the figures provided by the Agent General were of great interest and suggested that UNKRA headquarters were in fact already located in Korea. He wondered therefore why the Agent General should not say so publicly, it being understood that in view of the practical difficulties involved the Advisory Committee could not expect that every UNKRA employee should move immediately to Korea. In fact, the move of further personnel and transfer of additional operations to Korea might be discussed at future meetings of the Committee in the light of changing circumstances.

23. Though a lengthy discussion took place with respect to this matter no firm decision was reached. The Agent General, however, stated that he understood the feeling of the Committee and that he would always take the Committee's advice.

24. The Advisory Committee also considered financial questions, and under this item of the agenda discussion took place with respect to the revised Financial Regulations. The matter was first raised tentatively at the preliminary meeting of the Advisory Committee and at that time, the Canadian Representative took the opportunity, in accordance with instructions from Ottawa, to state that the Canadian Government approved the Financial Regulations as revised by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions.

25. During the more detailed discussion on this point which took place at the final meeting of the Advisory Committee, the United Kingdom made the following comments with respect to the financial regulations:

Article 3.1 A plan of expenditure for each financial year is to be submitted for approval to the Advisory Committee and in the view of the United Kingdom, it should be stipulated that this document should be submitted to members of the Committee well in advance of the meeting at which it is to be considered. The Agent General agreed to this suggestion and informed the Committee that a plan of expenditure would be submitted prior to the next meeting. He emphasized, however, that under the present conditions, it is difficult to prepare a very exact plan of expenditure.

Article 4.1 This article provides that the Agent General may make transfers to the extent authorized by the Advisory Committee. The United Kingdom suggested that transfers should not be made between operational and administrative items and the Agent General said that he was not opposed to this suggestion although he preferred the widest possible flexibility.

26. The Canadian representative agreed with the proposals made by the United Kingdom on the understanding that revised articles would be drafted for consideration at the Committee's next meeting.

27. As the representative of India was without instructions on this item of the agenda, the Committee agreed that tentative approval might be given to the Financial Regulations and that the Agent General might operate in accordance with those regulations on the understanding that the Committee will consider the matter of final approval at its next meeting.

28. The Committee also had before it financial statements for the period ending June 30, 1951 (Annex 2† to this despatch) including statements of contributions set out in appendices I and II to the document. With respect to contributions, the Canadian Representative stated that planning could be much more effective if money pledged to UNKRA were made available. He emphasized that contributions should not be withheld until suitable projects might be developed but that pledges should be honoured and funds made available now so that the UNKRA work could proceed on a realistic basis. This statement was welcomed by the Agent General who pointed out that if governments followed the example of the United Kingdom, the agency would be quite unable to operate. With respect to contributions in kind, the Agent General expressed the view that cash contributions would be much more satisfactory and he wished that other countries might follow the Canadian example.

29. The United States representative said that his country would continue to make contributions to direct relief in Korea through the Unified Command. He said that the U.S. Administration will continue to press for a contribution of $162 million to UNKRA for the first year. A limited appropriation of $69 million has been approved and it is expected that Congress will provide the balance.

30. Budget allocations and projections for the first and second quarters 1951/52 were presented to the Committee in a document attached as Annex 3† to this despatch. Although reference was made to particular items in this document during the course of discussion on other subjects, there was no discussion with respect to the document itself.

31. The Agent General requested advice concerning circulation of Advisory Committee summary records and UNKRA papers, and the Committee agreed that it would be inadvisable to give general distribution to such papers. It is obvious that to do so would have the effect of restricting discussions and the free expression of views, and would thus lessen the value of the advice which the Committee might give to the Agent General.

32. The United States suggested that all papers might be considered confidential, but that the Committee's decisions be announced, and the Chairman wondered whether it could be left to the Agent General to draw up for general distribution a report on each session. The Canadian Delegate asked whether the Agent General would be satisfied to undertake the work and the responsibility involved in the suggested procedure, and in reply the Agent General said that the Secretary of the Committee might prepare a summary of decisions which could be approved by the Chairman prior to distribution. This procedure will be followed for the session of the Committee just concluded and will be continued if it is found to be satisfactory.

33. The Agent General said that UNCURK had asked for UNKRA papers, and he suggested that they be provided with the public record. If that should not prove satisfactory the question of providing additional documentation might be discussed by a subsequent meeting of the Committee.

34. In respect of the question of coordination with the United Nations Technical Assistance Administration, the Agent General, in reply to a question from the Canadian representative, maintained that there was close cooperation between UNKRA and UNTAA and that the latter had loaned them a representative who was now stationed in Korea. He also stated that he worked through UNTAA in recruiting technical assistance experts for Korea but that because of the delays which often occurred in locating such experts, he found it advisable for UNKRA itself to operate independently and simultaneously in the search for appropriate experts. His explanation was not entirely satisfactory but he insisted that experts could be found more easily and more speedily if both UNKRA and UNTAA channels were used simultaneously.

35. The final item considered by the Committee was the time and plan of the next meeting. The Agent General expressed the wish for another meeting before Christmas and he suggested that this might take place in Paris about December 10. This was agreed, and the Agent General promised that basic papers would be circulated to members two weeks in advance, although it was always possible that he might wish to raise points not covered by documentation because of the rapidly changing situation in Korea.

LETTER NO. 460 Geneva, October 31, 1951

U.N. KOREAN RECONSTRUCTION AGENCY

In a brief conversation with Sir Arthur Rucker, Deputy Agent General of UNKRA, I learned that the chief purpose of Sir Arthur's return to Geneva and his forthcoming visit to the United States with the Agent General, is to report complete frustration with respect to the Agency's work.

2. Sir Arthur claims that the High Command is not implementing the terms of the agreement with UNKRA entered into some months ago and that UNKRA is able to do virtually nothing in Korea. Both Sir Arthur and Mr. Kingsley, the Agent General, are greatly concerned about this situation and are leaving today for the United States where they hope to reach a satisfactory understanding concerning the relationship between the Agency and the High Command.

UNKRA AND THE UNIFIED COMMAND

1. Prospects are not good that the military authorities in Washington will agree to the transfer to UNKRA of even limited responsibility for relief and rehabilitation work in Korea. This was the gist of information received at the Secretariat this morning from Kingsley, who is to meet tomorrow with the heads of the Defence and State Departments in an attempt to convince them that assumption by the agency of responsibility for specific projects in specified areas need not interfere unduly with the Unified Command.

2. Kingsley's deputy in Korea, Sir Arthur Rucker, told me today that Kingsley has already had informal talks with officials of the Pentagon and the State Department, and as a result now is inclined to believe that the army will not consider a transfer of authority in Korea so long as hostilities continue. Even if a cease-fire is negotiated, it is doubtful whether the Unified Command would be willing to relinquish its control over relief operations until there is strong evidence that a permanent political settlement is in sight. Kingsley had originally thought that the basic opposition to UNKRA did not come from the top echelon in the Department of Defence but was largely confined to an "empire building" group of senior officers in Pusan and Tokyo which is anxious that responsibility for relief activities should remain in their hands. Since arriving in Washington, however, he has gained the impression that the views of this group are shared by the top brass in the Pentagon. While the State Department would like to see the army divorced from relief activities as soon as possible, it is doubtful whether their opinions will carry great weight.

3. Sir Arthur is proceeding to Washington on Wednesday and has promised to keep us informed of developments. He made many interesting comments about the agency and its relationships with the Unified Command, the Korean Government and UNCURK, on which I shall report separately in a despatch.†

1. Contrary to the views expressed by UNKRA officials in New York, there appears to be no disagreement between the State Department and the Department of Defence as to when UNKRA should assume full responsibility for relief and rehabilitation activities in Korea. It is true that the Unified Command would not be willing to transfer full authority to UNKRA while hostilities continue. It would, moreover, seem difficult to advance logical arguments for such a transfer.

2. The United States Department of Defence, on the basis of present plans, will be providing some $200 million for relief and rehabilitation work in Korea in the current fiscal year, $100 million of which has been specifically authorized "for emergency relief for the civilian population of Korea". If UNKRA were to assume full responsibilities in this field, and it is not equipped at the moment to do so, further expenditures for civilian relief in Korea by the Department of Defence could not be made. As these Defence Department expenditures in Korea will not be considered as a part of the United States contribution to UNKRA, the net result would be a smaller overall United States contribution for Korean relief and rehabilitation. When UNKRA is in a position to assume full responsibility, the Department of Defence will no longer be able to justify to the general accounting office continued expenditures for civilian relief in Korea.

3. I would be grateful to receive your general views on this subject. In the meantime, I think we must accept with some reservation the statements made by UNKRA officials in New York which purport to interpret the attitude of the State Department.

UNKRA AND THE UNIFIED COMMAND

1. While conceding the point has not yet been reached when full responsibility for Korean civilian relief should pass to UNKRA, I think considerable political damage will be done to the agency and to the United Nations as a whole if UNKRA has to be placed in cold storage as the result of the discussions now going on in Washington between Mr. Kingsley and the Department of Defence.

2. There can be little complaint if the Pentagon, through the Unified Command, has complete control over military operations in Korea. Furthermore, there would be no advantage to the army's ceasing its relief activities until a political settlement is reached. However, I would suggest there are serious objections to having the Unified Command play a completely lone hand in the relief picture, even while hostilities continue. If we wish to continue to give conclusive evidence that relief operations in Korea have the support of the great majority of the members of the United Nations, it is important that some United Nations organ should function which is less directly responsible to the policy-makers in Washington than the Unified Command. Otherwise it becomes increasingly difficult to answer effectively Soviet charges that the United Nations action is primarily another aspect of the operation of United States foreign policy in Asia.

3. Admittedly UNKRA cannot now implement more than a small portion of the ambitious programme it had originally planned. However, it can assume responsibility for specific projects which the army's Civilian Assistance Command (whose hands are admittedly full already) cannot handle.

4. There are also practical reasons why UNKRA should not have to suspend operations. If the Unified Command wants to "go it alone" on relief and rehabilitation work, there should be no surprise in Washington that other members of the United Nations are reluctant to help the United States taxpayers finance relief operations over which they have no control.

Note de la Direction des Nations Unies pour le sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from United Nations Division to Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], November 19, 1951

UNKRA

At my request, Mr. McInnes has reviewed our policy towards UNKRA in the light of Washington's WA-3914 of November 6, and PERMDEL's No. 786 of November 7 (attached), and we have jointly prepared for your signature, if you concur, the attached telegram to Washington in reply.

2. A useful suggestion has been made by Thurrott, concerning which we should welcome your opinion, but we think it is too early to incorporate it in the telegram to Washington. It concerns a possible relationship between UNKRA and the Technical Assistance Programmes, and particularly the part which might be played by Cavell's office.

3. As you know, UNKRA is at present operating about 90% on Canadian money. If, at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, when the UNKRA item comes up for debate, it becomes apparent that, owing to the failure to obtain a cease-fire, contributing nations are unwilling to honour their pledges to UNKRA, the Agency will be left with comparatively little that it can do, with a very modest sum of money with which to do it, and the great bulk of that money having been supplied by Canada.

4. It is suggested that we explore the possibility of returning some of this money to Canada in the form of an UNKRA-financed programme of training in useful technical accomplishments, at Canadian institutions, of Korean students and Fellows.

5. If, for example, UNKRA were able to place 100 young Koreans in Canada in the fields of vocational training, social welfare, medicine, bridge-building, etc., it could make a very real and specific contribution to the rehabilitation of Korea, which should have the advantage of costing very little, and also of the funds involved being expended in Canada. Such a scheme would also have the advantage of enabling UNKRA to keep up the appearance of being usefully busy at a time when, in fact, it is not really going to be able to perform any major activities. By the time the trainees had received their instructions, the political and military situation in Korea might have improved to the point where the Agent-General's more ambitious programme can be started.

6. If you think there is any merit in the suggestion, it could be explored with Cavell's office.

UNKRA AND THE UNIFIED COMMAND

1. We have consistently discounted optimistic views expressed by UNKRA officials and our instructions to the Canadian Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations (copy of which was sent to you under cover of Letter No. V-3211 of October 31†), are confined to a request that everything be done to persuade other nations to honour the pledges which they have made to UNKRA. The Policy Guidance Section (para.16) points up the essential dilemma of UNKRA, which has now been reinforced by your telegram under reference, by Permdel's 786 of November 7, and by Permdel's Letter 1206 of November 6† (also referred to you), describing a conversation with Sir Arthur Rucker.

2. The fact is that work on the Agent-General's programme, announced to the Committee at its meeting in May, 1951, remains dependent upon the implementation of the agreement reached between Mr. Kingsley and General Ridgway on August 13, 1951. This agreement stated that the Unified Command would not transfer any authority to UNKRA (the question of UNKRA assuming full responsibility was never at issue) until such time as hostilities ceased.

3. Nevertheless, we think that there is still a useful area of activity open to UNKRA (see para. 5 below), and we agree with Permdel that there are grave political objections to UNKRA's ceasing operations. In addition to the arguments outlined in paras. 2 and 3 of Permdel's No. 786 of November 7, there is the by no means negligible point that the closing up of the Agency would have domestic repercussions in Canada, both in governmental circles, and among church and welfare groups, which have taken the existence of UNKRA, and Canada's participation in it, as an earnest of our concern over the humanitarian aspects of the Korean war.

4. We think that severe damage would be done to the prestige of United Nations if UNKRA were to suspend operations. It would be a confession of failure on the part of the Free World. It would be a denial of our often-expressed humanitarian aims. It would lend strength to the contention, made on both sides of the Iron Curtain, that the only result of the Korean war has been to strip, batter and impoverish the country and people of Korea. It seems to us that the one positive achievement which can come out of Korea, pending a successful outcome of hostilities, is a measure of rehabilitation work to be undertaken by UNKRA.

5. As to the area of activity open to UNKRA, we have in mind the specific and practical projects outlined by the Agent-General before the Advisory Committee's Meeting in Geneva on September 10, e.g., establishment of a teaching hospital; draught cattle project; coastal vessel programme; vocational training centres; medical rehabilitation and housing. We are also considering, at the official level, whether UNKRA might use part of its funds to take advantage of facilities offered to the United Nations expanded programme of Technical Assistance. We may communicate later with you on this point.

6. I should be grateful if you would present this point of view to the State Department and express the hope that the State and Defence Departments will take it into account in considering the Agent-General's assessment of the possible activities of UNKRA in the immediate or near future.

7. It remains our opinion that contributing nations should be asked to honour their pledges so that UNKRA may carry on such work as is possible in the immediate future, and plan with some confidence its later programme.

UNKRA

1. We were asked this afternoon to discuss the question of possible postponement of the special meeting of the agency's Advisory Committee, scheduled for December 10th, with William Sanders, Acting Assistant Secretary of State for United Nations Affairs, Graham Hall, Special Assistant for Korean Relief and Rehabilitation and Ward Allen of Hickerson's staff.

2. The State Department wished to inform us, in strict confidence, that Kingsley had signified his intention to resign from UNKRA. It was thought this new factor might influence our decision with regard to the proposed postponement of the special meeting of the Advisory Committee, since it would add to the present confusion for the committee to meet with UNKRA in an almost headless state. Furthermore, the State Department pointed out that the agreement between UNKRA and the Unified Command is now in the delicate stages of final negotiations. Apprehensions are felt that if a special meeting of the committee is held at this juncture, things might be said which might impede or even upset conclusion of the agreement. The State Department believes that Kingsley, on the verge of severing his connection with UNKRA, would not be likely to discuss with the committee in a satisfactory manner plans for implementation of the agreement. There is also a danger that if committee members, anxious to criticize Kingsley, should urge the espousal of elaborate plans by UNKRA, the Unified Command might be frightened off altogether when just at the point of reaching an understanding with UNKRA.

3. As stated in our WA-3914 of November 6th, it appears that there is not substantial disagreement between the State Department and the Department of Defence as to when and how UNKRA should become active in Korea. The State Department considers the agreement presently under negotiation to be a good one, as providing a practical basis for the initiation of operations by UNKRA, despite the limitations which must inevitably apply to the operation of a civilian agency in a theatre of war. They have provided us in advance and on a confidential basis with a draft of the proposed memorandum of understanding between the Unified Command and the UNKRA. The full text follows in my immediately following teletype,† but the essential paragraph reads as follows:

QUOTE (d) To such extent as may be mutually agreed, UNKRA will undertake, from time to time, relief and rehabilitation projects in Korea, additional to the United Nations Command program. Proposals for such projects will be initiated by UNKRA through the Joint Committee in Tokyo; and arrangements for the operation of agreed projects will be determined by the Joint Committees in Korea, Tokyo or Washington, as may be appropriate. UNQUOTE.

4. The State Department officials explained that the United States could hardly take the initiative themselves in obtaining postponement of the Advisory Committee meeting because the United States had in the first instance proposed the holding of such a meeting some months ago, when it had appeared in different circumstances that a useful purpose would be served. Furthermore the United States, to a large extent, might be considered as a party principal to the agreement at present under negotiation.

5. They recalled that when this special meeting had been first suggested, the Canadian Government had not been enthusiastic about it. We pointed out the difficulties in the way of the Canadian Government undertaking to initiate postponement of the Advisory Committee's special meeting. The State Department indicated it might not be necessary for any government to initiate a proposal for postponement formally. The main thing is whether governments concerned would be prepared to agree to postponement and to so instruct their representatives; if that could be done, the postponement might be brought about merely by means of discussions between representatives in New York or in Paris. There would then be no question of any one country in particular having taken the initiative.

6. The State Department officials offered the suggestion that if the special meeting of the Advisory Committee scheduled for December 10th were postponed, it might be advisable to schedule the next regular meeting of the committee for the early part of January, in order to avoid giving the impression of indefinite shelving of the question of UNKRA's commencing active operations. It is also thought likely that by that time the agreement between UNKRA and the Unified Command would have been concluded and therefore the Advisory Committee would be able to embark upon a practical discussion of projects.

7. The State Department requested us to convey their views to you immediately and they would appreciate receiving your decision as soon as possible. If postponement can be arranged, the State Department would be glad to know before Sunday, in the interest of economy, since it would then be possible to cancel reservations for air passage to Europe of certain officials concerned with the Advisory Committee meeting who would have to leave the United States in advance.

UNKRA

1. In the light of your telegrams under reference, we are prepared to agree to a postponement of the meeting of the Agency's Advisory Committee provisionally scheduled for December 10, provided that other members of the Committee are in accord, and that postponement is to a definite date not later than the end of the Paris part of the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, in order to permit, inter alia, a review of the finances and spending policy of the Agency.

2. We think that the reasons for the desired postponement should be fully explained by the State Department to India and Uruguay, as well as to the United Kingdom.

3. We are not expressing at this time any views on the proposed agreement, which we have not examined for this particular purpose, as we do not know whether it represents a proposal unilaterally put forward by the Unified Command and/or the United States Administration, or whether it represents an amicable settlement agreed to by UNKRA.

4. The request made to Olivier by Hall and reported to us in Permdel's 794 of November 17,† that we initiate postponement, we now consider to have been withdrawn. We therefore propose to take no action, but are willing to abide by the wishes of the majority of the members of the Committee.

5. I should be grateful if you would transmit these views to the State Department and inform us as soon as possible of their reaction, in order that we may keep the Delegation at Paris informed.

UNKRA ADVISORY COMMITTEE

1. You may already have learned that the next session of the Advisory Committee of UNKRA, which was to have been held in Paris on December 10, has now been postponed until January 10.

2. At the request of the United States State Department, we concurred in this decision, the initiative in which was, however, taken by Kingsley himself.

3. Chief reasons given by State Department for urging postponement were imminent resignation of Kingsley as Agent-General of UNKRA, and inadvisability of Advisory Committee meeting while fresh agreement was being negotiated between UNKRA and the Unified Command regarding the former's status in Korea, and its ability to start operations in the near future.

Déclaration générale pour la gouverne de la délégation canadienne

General Statement for the Guidance of the Canadian Delegation

GENERAL

1. While the various organs of the United Nations should be used to the maximum extent possible for strengthening the unity of the Free World, no support should be given to action in the United Nations which would force the withdrawal from the organization of the Soviet Union or which would give the U.S.S.R. a convincing pretext for such a withdrawal. The United Nations still provides opportunities for contact between the Cominform World and the Free World, and the withdrawal of the Soviet Union would only lead to breaking off this contact without in any way altering the present balance of power in the world. Moreover, if the Western democracies act in a manner which forces the U.S.S.R. to leave the organization, this might well be followed by the withdrawal of such "neutralist" states as India and Indonesia, with the consequent decline in United Nations' prestige in Asian territories where its influence is of great importance to the West.

POLITICAL AND SECURITY QUESTIONS

Collective Measures Committee

2. The Collective Measures Committee, which was established by the "Uniting for Peace" Resolution adopted by the Assembly on November 3, 1950, has included in its report a number of recommendations and guiding principles for military, economic and political sanctions which might be taken by the United Nations against a future aggressor.

3. In view of its composition and its cumbersome mechanism, the United Nations is clearly not the appropriate body to direct actual military operations in a major war. Yet the United Nations could not remain purely passive if such a war broke out and still retain any real moral authority. In the event of a general war, the United Nations should be used by the Western Powers as an agency for securing the maximum support from states not directly and initially participating in military operations. It follows from this that the role of the United Nations in a major war should be at least as active as has been its participation in the Korean crisis. In the debates at the Assembly on the report of the Collective Measures Committee the Delegation should be guided by these principles.

Disarmament and Atomic Energy

4. The Western Powers are publicly committed to accepting unconditionally a plan for the international control of atomic energy which was approved by a large majority of the Members of the United Nations some time ago, provided that the Soviet Union also accepts this plan. The democracies are also committed to the unanimous resolution of the General Assembly of December, 1946, in which the Assembly recognized the necessity of an early general regulation and the reduction of armaments and armed forces. In view, however, of the present overwhelming superiority of the Soviet Union in conventional armaments and, in particular, in numbers of trained troops, the real position of the democracies is not quite so straightforward.

5. Debate on these questions at the Assembly will probably centre around the report of the Committee of Twelve, which recommended that a single commission should be established to take over the functions of the present Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments. While it is unlikely that the establishment of a single commission will have the effect of modifying the declared policies of either the United States or the Soviet Union, the Delegation should support its establishment since it would at least provide the opportunity for a fresh start. The Delegation should guard against any precipitate rejection of proposals in this field which may be advanced by the Cominform states, particularly since such rejection out of hand would offend such influential states as India and Yugoslavia.

Treatment of Indians

6. The Assembly will also discuss again the perennial question of the treatment of people of Indian origin in the Union of South Africa. Primarily because of the South African Government's refusal to agree to any United Nations intervention in this matter, negotiations for a round-table conference between India, Pakistan and South Africa have now broken down. It seems evident that the present impasse will continue, and a fruitless and acrimonious debate take place at each Assembly, unless and until an advisory opinion is obtained from the International Court of Justice regarding the competence of the United Nations to intervene in this question. As long ago as November 25, 1946, the Canadian Delegation supported the view that an opinion on this matter should be obtained from the Court. To date, however, India has objected to this, on the grounds that the question is essentially political, not legal. The Delegation might do anything it could to persuade the Indians to modify their opposition to a reference to the Court, pointing out that, without such a reference, there is little chance of the present deadlock being broken.

ELECTIONS

Security Council

7. The Delegation should support Pakistan and Chile for the seats now occupied, by India and Ecuador. The arguments against electing a Cominform state to replace Yugoslavia are not convincing, but the Delegation should not support the Cominform candidate (probably Czechoslovakia) if both the United States and the United Kingdom oppose its election. In the latter event the Delegation should vote for Ethiopia, rather than for Greece, which is also a candidate, as the election of Greece would give the Council too strong a NATO complexion.

Economic and Social Council

8. The Delegation should support the re-election of China, France and Belgium (on the understanding that the Netherlands is not a candidate). For the seats now filled by Chile and Peru the Canadian Delegation should support the two states which are the choices of the Latin American bloc, with the exception that the Delegation should not support Argentina in view of the repressive actions taken against freedom of the press by its present regime. For the sixth seat the Delegation should support India for re-election, even though Australia is also a candidate since India has exercised a moderating influence on some of the other under-developed states and Canada is supporting Pakistan for the Security Council.

International Court of Justice

9. The Delegation should vote for the re-election of Judges Green H. Hackworth of the United States, Charles de Visscher of Belgium and Helge Klaestad of Norway. The Soviet candidate to replace the retiring Judge Krylov will probably be Professor Golumsky and the Delegation should support his election. The Delegation should also support the election of Sir Benegal Rau of India in place of the retiring Mexican incumbent (Judge Alfaro). Apart from Sir Benegal's own personal abilities, his election to the Court would have the desirable effect of increasing the representation of Asia and of common law systems. In the by-election occasioned by the death last May of the Brazilian member of the Court, Judge Azevedo, the Canadian Delegation should support, for the remainder of this term, the election of the Brazilian candidate, Dr. Levy Carneiro.

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL QUESTIONS

Economic Development

10. The main economic item on the agenda of the Assembly concerns the various aspects of the economic development of under-developed countries, in particular the methods of financing such development, the provision of technical assistance and the promotion of land reforms. The Delegation might express agreement with the principles formulated by the thirteenth session of the Economic and Social Council on these subjects. It should, however, oppose proposals which Chile is expected to make for the creation at this time of new international machinery or of a special international fund for the purpose of making outright grants to under-developed countries to finance their development programmes. The Delegation should commend the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies for the progress made and the results so far achieved in their various programmes of technical assistance. The Delegation should also emphasize that the principle of self-help is basic to the successful operation of all United Nations programmes for assistance to under-developed countries.

Korean Relief

11. The twelve-month rehabilitation programme proposed by the Agent-General for the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) has received general approval from UNKRA's Advisory Committee, on which Canada is represented. It seems unlikely, however, that the Agency can proceed much beyond the planning and procurement stage so long as hostilities continue in Korea. The Government is particularly concerned over the failure of member nations to honour their pledges to UNKRA's Contributions Fund. Though $205,000,000 (U.S.) has been pledged, less than $8,000,000 (U.S.) has so far been received in cash. The Delegation should therefore press hard for the honouring of all outstanding pledges.

TRUSTEESHIP QUESTIONS

South-West Africa

12. This perennial problem is probably the most important item in the field of trusteeship and non-self-governing territories on the Assembly's agenda. On this subject the Committee of Five, established by a resolution of the Assembly last December, has formulated a number of compromise proposals designed to implement the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice and yet to take into account the arguments made by the representatives of the Union of South Africa. The South African Government has now rejected the proposals of the Committee of Five and the latter will be submitting a report of failure to the General Assembly. There is little doubt that the proposals developed by the Committee of Five were very moderate, particularly in that they tried to overcome South Africa's objections by suggesting a plan which adhered very closely to the procedures of the League of Nations. South Africa's rejection of these proposals will make it difficult for countries like Canada not to take a stand against her. By refusing to agree to the findings of the Court or to perform the obligations which the Court found still to exist, the South African Government has acted in a way which will undoubtedly provoke a hostile reaction in the General Assembly. Nevertheless, the Delegation should not support condemnatory resolutions phrased in intemperate language because the adoption of such resolutions would make the South African Government even more intransigent. The Delegation might support a resolution regretting the South African Government's unwillingness to comply with the International Court's advisory opinion and its unwillingness to submit a report on the administration of the territory. Such a position is in accordance with the previous Canadian support for the advisory opinion of the Court.

Participation of Italy in the Trusteeship Council

13. At present, under the rules of procedure of the Trusteeship Council, Italy has the right to participate without vote in the Council when the latter discusses the reports on Italian Somaliland, for which Italy is the administering authority. As Italy is not a Member of the United Nations it seems clear that Italy has already received the maximum consideration which is possible at the present time. The Delegation should therefore take the position that, while we would like to see Italy a Member of the United Nations, we believe that until it has obtained such membership it cannot have a vote in the Trusteeship Council, without violating the provisions of the Charter (in particular, Article 86).

ADMINISTRATIVE AND BUDGETARY QUESTIONS

The Budget

14. The Secretary-General has submitted budget estimates for the year 1952 totalling $46,568,300. The Advisory Committee on administrative and budgetary questions has recommended reductions in these estimates amounting to $2,035,400. The Delegation should, as in previous years, support proposals, including those of the Advisory Committee, designed to ensure the efficient and economical administration of the United Nations without impairing essential services. It should also encourage efforts to achieve greater co-ordination and the elimination of overlapping and duplication between the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies.

Scale of Contributions

15. In direct response to objections raised by Canada and other countries at the Fifth Session of the General Assembly, the Contributions Committee has recommended a substantial increase (totalling 3.72%) in the contributions of the Cominform states, in order to reflect more closely their true capacity to pay. However, a further reduction in the United States contribution (from 38.92 to 36.90 percent) in partial implementation of the principle of a 33 1/3 percent ceiling accepted by the Assembly in 1948, together with a significant improvement in Canada's economic position, has resulted in a recommendation for a small increase of .05% (from 3.30 to 3.35 percent) in Canada's contribution for 1952. The Delegation may support the Committee's recommendations provided that the Canadian increase does not exceed .05% and that the principle of a per capita ceiling is maintained. It should emphasize that reductions in the contribution of the United States toward the 33 1/3 percent ceiling should be accompanied by compensating increases in its contributions to other United Nations agencies where it pays less than this ceiling. The Delegation should also insist that further progress toward the elimination of the maladjustments still remaining in the scale, particularly in the contribution of the U.S.S.R., should be made during the next year.

Questions relatives à l'Asie étudiées lors de la sixième session de l'Assemblée générale

Asian Questions Before the Sixth Session of the General Assembly

During the past year the gap between the North Atlantic Treaty powers and the countries of Asia has widened. China has adopted an attitude of hostility toward the western world which will take many years of patience and goodwill to break down. Its alignment with the Soviet Union is more definite, the identification of their interests is firmer, and the potential differences between them have receded for the time being into the background. Some of the minor countries of Asia have been irritated by the favour shown to Japan in an effort to gain the support of that country for the west. A large and growing area of misunderstanding and distrust has arisen between Asian countries led by India and some members of the United Nations led by the United States, over relations with China and the course to be followed in trying to bring the Korean war to an end.

2. If the differences between the west and the Asian states led by India should become more pronounced, the result could be extremely serious, especially in its effects on Western attempts to restrain the expansionism of the Soviet Union. Canadian effort at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly should therefore be directed toward helping to eliminate misunderstanding and, where possible, to bridge the gaps between the policies of the United States government and those of the Asian governments. This will be no easy task in view of the inflexibility of United States policy as a result of the difficulties created for the Administration by the dismissal of General MacArthur and the Republican attack on the Administration's Far Eastern policies, and as a result of the tendency in the United States to place opposition to Communism above all other considerations.

3. Chinese representation and the position of Formosa are almost certain to come before the Assembly in some form while the situation in Korea and Chinese Nationalist charges of Soviet intervention in Chinese affairs are already on the agenda.

Chinese Representation

4. A change in Chinese representation in the Assembly is most improbable during the Sixth Session. The United States, United Kingdom and Canadian governments are on record as opposing admission of the Central People's Government to the United Nations, the former apparently without limit and the latter two until China shall have ceased to aid aggression in Korea. It is unlikely that any motion for a change in representation would receive substantial support. The Canadian delegation would be consistent if it voted against a change of representation. Any statement against changing Chinese representation should, to be realistic, avoid any suggestion that the change is opposed from any admiration for the Nationalist Government or from any conviction that it represents the Chinese people. It should be related solely to China's intervention in Korea. An opportunity may arise to defer a decision on Chinese representation on procedural grounds: a proposal in such terms would avoid the substantive question of which government should represent China, and would be preferable from the Canadian point of view. The United Kingdom would support such a procedural resolution, and probably the United States would also. The special committee set up by the Fifth Session to study Chinese representation has proved abortive; it would probably, therefore, be as well to avoid supporting any extension of its life.

Formosa

5. The Cairo Declaration by the representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and China in 1943 promised the restoration of Formosa to the Chinese state. This promise was confirmed in the Potsdam Proclamation by the United States, the United Kingdom and China, subsequently adhered to by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1945. The Japanese Instrument of Surrender, also signed in 1945, was based on the Potsdam Proclamation and provided that the terms of the Proclamation should be carried out. Canada signed the Instrument of Surrender. De facto administration of Formosa by the Chinese Nationalist Government has been acquiesced in by the Canadian government through the acceptance of a note from the Nationalist Government in 1946 stating that Formosa was restored to Chinese sovereignty and that Formosans had regained their Chinese citizenship; through agreement that the commercial modus vivendi with China should cover Formosa; and through various administrative actions. While it is true that circumstances have now changed in that China is ruled by a government which we do not like, it is open to doubt whether it is wise to repudiate a wartime agreement.

6. The Canadian delegation should try to prevent the question of the disposition of Formosa from being raised as a substantive question and should endeavour to have the question left open until after a cease-fire has been arranged in Korea. Any debate on the substantive question is bound to widen the rift between the orient and the occident, and to force the United States to take an increasingly firm position from which it will have difficulty in retreating when the time comes.

Korea

7. The situation in Korea is so unpredictable that only general instructions can be given before the Assembly meets. In the absence of an agreed truce, it would be advisable, if possible, to maintain the present machinery of an additional measures committee of the General Assembly, where recommendations can be formulated. This procedure has advantages over consideration of additional measures in the first instance by the Political Committee. Our aim in the Additional Measures Committee might well be to try to avoid the imposition of additional military, diplomatic or economic sanctions until present measures have had better opportunity to demonstrate their worth. In this way it will be possible to avoid an undue risk of driving China more firmly into the arms of the Soviet Union.

8. If an armistice is concluded it is to be expected that the United Nations Commander will submit a report to that effect to the United Nations. If the report is made to the General Assembly, the problem arises who is to be responsible for the next obvious step, political negotiations aimed at a larger settlement. As negotiators for the United Nations, the group of countries which together are supplying the forces in Korea would probably be adequate provided India (which provides an ambulance unit but no fighting troops) is included. Their aim should be to achieve a general settlement in the Far East even though this would be difficult in view of the attitude of the United States towards the seating of Communist China in the United Nations and the disposition of Formosa. It is unlikely that any body set up by the General Assembly at this session would be able to approach the problem of a general settlement in the Far East during the lifetime of the Sixth Session of the Assembly.

Nationalist Chinese Charges Against the Soviet Union

9. It is difficult to deal realistically with the charges laid by the Nationalist government because even the countries which maintain relations with the Nationalists recognize that in fact they are not the effective government of China. The most desirable line to pursue at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly would therefore be one leading to the adoption of a course which would allow the charges to be left in abeyance. One solution would be to support any move which would continue this problem in the Interim Committee rather than in the General Assembly proper, along the lines of the resolution passed on December 1, 1950.

Pacte international provisoire sur les droits de l'homme

Draft International Covenant on Human Rights

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], October 12, 1951

The General Assembly of the United Nations, at its Sixth Session opening on November 6th, will "reconsider" the decision taken last year in Resolution 421(V)E to include in one covenant articles on economic, social and cultural rights, together with articles on civil and political rights. This is in consequence of a recommendation made to it by the Thirteenth Session of the Economic and Social Council, which concluded its meetings on September 21st.

2. It has been the consistent Canadian view that the Commission on Human Rights should first concentrate on drafting a covenant restricted to the traditional civil and political liberties. This view has been expressed, or is at least implicit, in Cabinet Memoranda of March 14th and July 30th, 1951, has been communicated to the Secretary General of the United Nations, and was the basis of instruction given to the Canadian Delegation to the Thirteenth Session of the Economic and Social Council.

3. At the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, therefore, the formulation of economic, social and cultural rights, either as a part of the "first" covenant or as a separate covenant, will be an item on the Agenda.

4. A study of the articles relating to economic, social and cultural rights, as drafted by the latest (Seventh) Session of the Commission on Human Rights, shows that the best covenant that could be hoped for would comprise no more than a series of commendable objectives, provisions for the implementation of which would amount merely to a reporting procedure. These objectives are already adequately covered, at least for the time being, in the present Universal Declaration on Human Rights. The reporting procedure envisaged in the present draft covenant would appear to be unnecessary in the light of the arrangements already established for annual reports from member states on developments in the field of human rights submitted for inclusion in the United Nations Year Book on Human Rights.

5. It is recommended that the following instructions regarding the formulation of economic, social and cultural rights be given to the Canadian Delegation to the Sixth Session of the General Assembly:

(a) The Delegation should maintain the position that it is impractical to combine economic, social and cultural with civil and political rights in a single covenant;

(b) Should it be proposed to formulate a separate covenant on economic, social and cultural rights, the Delegation should oppose the proposal for the reasons set forth above and especially on the ground that the precise formulation of such rights in an international legally binding instrument is impracticable, and that legal remedies for the violation of such rights would be unworkable.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 10, 1951

ELECTIONS TO THE PRINCIPAL ORGANS AND COMMITTEES OF THE UNITED NATIONS

I attach for your consideration a copy of a memorandum of August 28† on the subject of Turkey's candidature for one of the non-permanent seats on the Security Council. In a marginal comment on this memorandum you suggested that the time had perhaps come for us to reconsider our increasingly unrealistic policy of refusing to pledge advance support for candidates and confining ourselves to an assurance of "sympathetic consideration".

2. There are, of course, certain advantages in the policy we have followed in the past. Coupled as it has been with a reluctance formally to canvass support for our own candidatures, it has kept us from becoming involved in the more flagrant horse-trading that inevitably occurs in the context of elections to the principal organs and committees of the United Nations. Secondly, our refusal to make advance commitments has left our hands comparatively free, and has enabled us to support the election of countries whose candidature was not definitely announced until the final stages of the electoral campaign. Finally, by responding to the approaches of all prospective candidates in uniformly neutral terms, we have perhaps succeeded in creating a minimum of disappointment and resentment among candidates we are either unable or unwilling to support.

3. On closer consideration, however, it seems to me that these advantages are somewhat precarious in nature. While elections in the United Nations are held by secret ballot, candidates are, as a rule, fairly certain as to the quarters from which they may expect support or opposition. The net result of our traditionally coy attitude, therefore, is probably that we succeed neither in winning friends, as we might by clearly indicating our support for specific candidates, nor in influencing people, where such influence may be required to ensure the election of the most responsible and best qualified candidate.

4. As an illustration of the political advantages which might be derived from an unequivocal advance pledge of support, it would suffice to recall the case of Egypt's recent candidature for election to the Economic and Social Council when we did, in fact, decide to assure the Egyptian Consul-General of our proposed support. Since 1947, when Canada came out in favour of the partition of Palestine, our relations with the Arab world have been cool, if not strained. The Arab thesis has been that Canada was inexorably committed to the policy followed by the major Western powers in the Middle East and a basis of mutual understanding between Canada and the Arab world was thereby precluded from being established. In the light of this slightly exaggerated persecution complex we should perhaps avail ourselves of every opportunity of responding to reasonable overtures on the part of the Arabs, insofar as such a response does not conflict with the general objectives of Canadian policy. Egypt's request that we support its candidature for a seat on the Economic and Social Council presented a good opportunity for creating a more favourable atmosphere in Canadian-Arab relations, and the disadvantages inherent in an advance pledge of support in such a case would seem to be offset by tangible political advantages.

5. Once we have reached a considered decision to support a country for election to one of the principal organs or committees of the United Nations, we should, I think, be prepared to assist our candidate in securing election. The difficulties experienced by Turkey in gaining a sufficient majority for its recent election to the Security Council provide, I believe, a case in point. Canada was strongly convinced that Turkey could play a far more effective role in the Council than the Lebanon, and active Canadian support for Turkey's election might well have succeeded in persuading wavering delegations, where United States efforts to swing the balance in favour of Turkey could be resented as a form of pressure.

6. In the light of these considerations, I believe that we might henceforth abandon the cautious and, in the final analysis, unrealistic attitude we have adopted in the past. Once the field of potential candidates has emerged clearly and we are in a position to reach a definite and final decision, the only sensible course of action would seem to be for us to give explicit assurances to the candidates we propose to support, and to exert some effort in seeing to it that they are elected. This would not, of course, preclude us from confining our response to an assurance of "sympathetic consideration" in cases where it would be politically unwise to make an advance commitment or where we were genuinely uncertain as to our eventual line of action.

7. As a corollary of this policy we should be justified, I think, in pressing our own candidature for office in the organs and committees of the United Nations with more vigour than we have displayed on previous occasions. It is, of course, gratifying for us to be elected on the initiative of others rather than an a result of a systematic and formal campaign of canvassing votes on our part, but I doubt if such an approach is likely to increase our chances of election in the immediate future. The delicate restraint, which characterized our recent bid for a vice-presidency in the General Assembly, lost for us the votes of many friendly delegations which, until the very last moment, were uncertain as to the definiteness of our intentions. There can be little doubt that a formal request for support at an early stage in the electoral campaign would have assured Canada's election by a substantial margin.

8. I do not believe that a change in our policy, along the lines indicated in this memorandum, would necessarily have to involve us in electoral horse-trading. It should be quite possible for us to be more forthright in regard to our own candidature for office without, at the same time, deviating from our previous practice of supporting other candidates for office solely on the basis of individual merit.[1]

PRE-ASSEMBLY TALKS

Elections to the Security Council

3. The continuing non-permanent members are the Netherlands, Turkey and Brazil. The retiring members are India, Ecuador and Yugoslavia. We have promised our support to Pakistan to replace India. We have been informed that the Latin American states are considering Chile or El Salvador as a replacement for Ecuador. I think we should use whatever influence we can against the candidacy of El Salvador, which obviously does not meet the primary requirement of Article 23.[2]

4. The main difficulty in elections to the Security Council will be over the election of the successor to Yugoslavia. The State Department appears to be determined not to support any candidate from a Cominform state. At first they thought of Greece as a possible successor to Yugoslavia and later on of Ethiopia.

5. I am not myself impressed by the arguments against electing a Soviet satellite.[3] It seems to me that one serious disadvantage of not electing a Soviet satellite, particularly as long as the Peking Government is not represented at the Security Council, is that the Security Council is obviously being packed against the Russians. This, like the votes at the San Francisco Japanese Peace Conference, tends to mislead opinion in our own countries about the comparative strength of the Soviet and the non-Soviet worlds. It seems to me that the only argument against electing a Soviet satellite, such as Poland, is that it increases the difficulty of mustering the necessary seven votes in the Council. I do not see, however, why this should be particularly difficult, except on very rare occasions. If the three Western Powers in the Council are agreed, they will have no difficulty in getting the two Latin American votes and the votes of the Netherlands and Turkey. This will give them seven votes. As long as Nationalist China is on the council, they can usually get the Chinese vote, and on most issues they ought to be able to get the Pakistani vote. About the only time when they will face difficulties will be on votes on Asian questions, such as Kashmir and Palestine.

6. If the Assembly decides against electing a non-Cominform state to succeed Yugoslavia, I suggest that the successor should come from that great part of the world which lies between Pakistan and the Pacific coast of the Americas which would otherwise be unrepresented on the Council, except by the puppet regime in Formosa. Indonesia might be the best but we could not have three Muslim states on the Council at the same time (Turkey, Pakistan and Indonesia). The choice would therefore seem to lie between Burma and Ethiopia.[4]

PRE-ASSEMBLY TALKS — SECURITY COUNCIL ELECTIONS — "SATELLITE SEAT"

1. At yesterday's pre-Assembly talks, Gross said that the State Department had been reviewing their policy for Security Council elections and still favoured Greece as a candidate for Yugoslavia's seat.

2. When the rest of us said that we were not greatly impressed by the arguments against electing a satellite, Gross said that they still had an open mind concerning possible compromise candidates but they would not contemplate voting for a satellite. If the Korean fighting continued, he said, he thought it inconceivable that a satellite would be elected. He therefore urged us to ask our governments to consider second choice candidates. If there was no prior understanding among us whatever, there would be great confusion in a free for all election in Paris.

3. We then discussed possible second choices in a very tentative way. Gross said that Romulo had told him in confidence that the Philippines might run for Yugoslavia's seat and would, if elected, withdraw from ECOSOC. The United Kingdom and French said they thought that the Philippines had already had more than their share of United Nations offices and proposed Thailand. We said that as between Burma and Ethiopia, you would prefer the latter, particularly in view of their Korean contribution, although you were not much impressed with either candidate.

4. The United States are still thinking of Lebanon as a possibility (see our letter No. 1055) as, unless an Arab were already on the Council, they would oppose Greece as a replacement for Turkey next year. United Kingdom do not want an Arab.

SECURITY COUNCIL ELECTIONS

1. When the Security Council elections take place at the next plenary of the Assembly, Pakistan and Chile are virtually assured of election. We shall vote for both. Chile is the choice of the Latin-American caucus which has picked Salvador for the Trusteeship Council.

2. As regards the Yugoslavia seat, only Greece and the Philippines are in the running, and the Philippines hardly qualify as "Eastern European" — a tradition it might be well to maintain. Ethiopia has expressed desire to be on the Council and has abstained on almost everything so far. I think we shall vote for Greece.

3. Some of the reasons which have led me to favour Greece are given in a memorandum which will be forwarded to you in the next bag.

SECURITY COUNCIL ELECTIONS — YUGOSLAV SEAT

From what you said at the meeting this morning, I gather you have not yet made up your mind as to whether to vote for a satellite or Greece. Ethiopia has expressed no desire to be on the Security Council, and the Philippines hardly qualify as "Eastern European".

2. There is still a good deal of obscurity, in my mind at least, as to the nature of the understanding between the Great Powers on the "Eastern European seat". You have your own recollections to draw on, but, as you know, the Americans do not admit that there ever was an understanding to give the "Eastern European seat" to the Soviet nominee every year. Some kind of agreement was reached in London in 1946, which recognized that, for the First Assembly, the Western Powers would not oppose a Soviet nominee, thus giving the communists a second seat on the Security Council. Perhaps the implication of this agreement was that it might be extended in future years,[6] but Sir Gladwyn Jebb, who was a party to the agreement reached in London, does not challenge the American interpretation that it applied only to the first Session of the Assembly.

3. Not only do the Americans now deny that the agreement was intended to cover future years, but they argue that even when the agreement was made it was understood as a precedent applying to the election of an Eastern European state — and at that time Czechoslovakia was not a communist state.

4. If we accept the thesis that no promises were ever made to the Russians to vote for their nominee for the Security Council, all we now have to go on is the well-established precedent that a Council seat goes to an Eastern European country. Greece, like Yugoslavia, qualifies under this heading. From the point of view of the Soviet Union, the provocation was certainly greater in electing Yugoslavia last year than it would be if Greece were elected this year.

This was certainly the implication generally drawn [L.B. Pearson].

5. The Greeks themselves have been using a further argument with delegations such as ours who are known to favour the tradition of electing a satellite from that part of the world. They say that this year the effective choice is between Greece and the Philippines — now that the United Kingdom has decided not to vote for a satellite. While there might be much to be said for not limiting the chances of election of states in other parts of the world by maintaining the tradition of an Eastern European seat, the Greeks argue that if we wish the tradition to be kept alive, we would do better to vote for them than for the Philippines, so that, if there should be an easing of the tension between East and West, we might again elect a Soviet nominee without too much inconsistency.

6. So far as we know at present, the only delegation with which we are closely associated which is still thinking seriously of voting for a satellite is the Australian delegation, and they are not definite.

7. There is some discussion in the commentary of the undesirability of "packing" the Security Council with N.A.T.O. countries, especially while the Nationalists continue to represent China. This is certainly not a point to be lightly dismissed. On the other hand, an analysis of the voting in the Security Council in recent months, and notably the example of the Anglo-Iranian dispute, shows how difficult it is even now, with Yugoslavia rather than a satellite on the Council, to secure seven affirmative votes. Abstentions are increasingly in vogue. Further, with the strong possibility that there will be a cease-fire in Korea and the perhaps more remote chance that this might lead to a change in Chinese representation in the United Nations within the next year, it seems to me gratuitous to give away a seat on the Council. Three Soviet votes would better reflect the real balance of power in the world but would tend to make it still more difficult for the Council to agree on anything but the weakest and lowest common denominator in any situation.

8. The difficulty of getting seven affirmative votes in the Security Council might be of very considerable importance to Canada in the field of collective security. We want the U.N. to be able to act in this vital field. We have supported the "Uniting for Peace" resolution and the Collective Measures Committee. We now have means of circumventing a Soviet veto in the Council. But we have no way of getting U.N. action without seven affirmative votes in the Council.[7]

THE NEW U.S. PROPOSALS ON REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

The two attached telegrams from Wrong (WA-3825 and WA-3827)† relate to the new U.S. position on the regulation and reduction of all armed forces and armaments including atomic weapons. This new position is set out in a paper which has been approved by Mr. Truman, Mr. Acheson and Mr. Lovett; the text appears in WA-3825.[8] The paper is regarded as so secret that it has not yet been given to the U.S. Permanent Delegation to the U.N., and among foreign governments has so far been shown only to the U.K. and ourselves. It is expected, however, that the U.S. Ambassador in Paris will very shortly discuss it with Mr. Schuman in an effort to obtain French support for joint action by the Big Three at the opening of the Assembly.

We have not yet had time to prepare a well-rounded and detailed commentary on the new U.S. proposals, and these notes are made up of preliminary remarks on particular aspects of the subject. The attached telegram to Wrong, for your signature if you approve, prescribes a course of action which appears to meet the immediate circumstances.

A. New Features

There appear to be two really new features incorporated in the U.S. paper; outside of these and some propaganda material, it does not differ notably from the terms of the General Assembly resolution of 1946 on disarmament.[9]

The first new point is the express willingness of the U.S. Government to accept as a first step "a progressive system for international disclosure and verification of all armed forces and armaments on a continuing basis. This means revealing in appropriate stages all armed forces — including para-military, security, and police forces — and all armaments, including atomic, and providing for proper and progressive international inspection to verify the adequacy and accuracy of this information." Hitherto the U.S. has not been prepared to disclose atomic weapons.

[8] Voir/See United States, Department of State, Foreign Relations of the United States (FRUS), 1951, Volume 2, Washington: United States Government Printing Office, 1979, pp. 559-562.

[9] Voir/See Volume 12, pp. 801-21.

The second new point is the list of criteria, termed "examples which could be suggested for consideration in the course of detailed negotiations on the programme" for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and armaments. This schedule of criteria is something which has not been attempted since the debates on disarmament in the League of Nations; it appears to lead to proposals of the same general type of those put forward in the League, although we have not yet had time to work out in detail the implications of the criteria listed. This point is discussed in the attached telegram to Wrong.

B. A Genuine Offer?

We now know that the U.S. refusal in 1946 to disclose the number of atomic weapons which it held arose from the fact that the number was very small. This is no longer the case, and perhaps the U.S. would rather like to make public the figures on the respective atomic capabilities of the U.S. and the U.S.S.R. now, when the disparity is greater proportionally as it is ever likely to be again. If so, the U.S. may in this proposal be making a genuine offer to the U.S.S.R. in the hope that the latter will accept, and not be putting forward a proposal they do not themselves believe in, in the expectation that the Russians will reject it. At any rate, considered as a genuine offer, the paper appears to us to be a good proposal; it is the first U.S. overture which gives any appearance of being a real effort at horse-trading, and in this light it appears both realistic and enlightened.

C. Propaganda Aspects

It may be that there is no expectation in the U.S. that the U.S.S.R. will nibble. In this case, presumably the proposal is being put forward as a propaganda exercise. As such, it is from the U.S. point of view a good manoeuvre, for it will help to reduce the doubts of the countries of Western Europe that the U.S. is honestly willing to seek for a real accommodation with the Russians and is not hell-bent for a show-down. Unless the Russians come out with something even better at the Assembly, this proposal should also capture the propaganda initiative for the West for the sweeping references to reduction of international tensions, easing of the burden of armaments, cessation of fighting in Korea and reduction of the danger of war are supported by at least one concrete and significant concession on atomic energy.

D. Tactics

The U.S. hopes that the U.K. and France will support it in sponsoring this proposal in the Assembly, but is likely to go ahead on its own if necessary. We are told that these new proposals, having been approved at the very top level, are not subject to modification for bargaining purposes but represent a firm position. On most of the points covered, this is probably justifiable, but there is one item which we think might be of value as a bargaining counter should the U.S.S.R. show any interest. This point is the reference to the Majority Plan for atomic energy which in the context appears to us superfluous; it is not a necessary safeguard, and it is possible that a skilful approach on our part might persuade the U.S. that this reference could be deleted if genuine negotiations should develop.

It is intended that Mr. Acheson shall put forward the new proposals in his opening speech, but it is unlikely that any real answer can be given by the U.S.S.R. until a good deal of time is spent in examining the terms. The Americans wish to have their proposal considered as a separate new item on the agenda instead of being considered in the debates on the report of the Committee of Twelve.[10]

NEW U.S. PROPOSALS ON REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

Following for Wrong from Pearson: In our immediately following teletype we are giving the text of a preliminary note prepared in the Department on the contents of your messages. In this message I shall outline certain steps which you might take.

2. It seems to me that there are certain significant gaps in our information on this subject. From paragraph 3 of your message WA-3827 I judge that Franks and Acheson have been discussing this matter for some time. It would be most valuable if you would talk to Franks, explaining our interest in the proposals which have just been made known to us and admitting frankly that we are not sure to what extent this is a genuine offer and to what extent a propaganda exercise. Apparently the original initiative lay with the U.K., but the project appears now to have been taken up vigorously by the U.S. It seems that in the course of this development the project has changed in character. ("The U.K. Government had pressed for a general program of disarmament and said that the U.S. proposals might be considered as falling short of the U.K. desiderata." "The most important consideration in the view of the State Department is that the Western Powers under the U.S. leadership should take the initiative at the outset of the General Assembly meeting in the general debate on the issue of 'peace'.") Any light which Franks can throw on the background of these proposals would be useful, and I should like particularly to know what U.K. desiderata the U.S. has refused to incorporate.

On the origins of the Committee of 12, see Volume 16, pp. 514-38; for a brief account of its work, see Canada, Department of External Affairs, Canada and the United Nations, 1951-52, Ottawa: Queen's Printer, 1952, p. 11.

3. Other points on which I should be glad to have fuller information arise from the actual text of the U.S. paper. Does the U.S. Government envisage a timetable according to which agreement concerning the procedures for disclosure and verification would be reached, the disclosures made, and the necessary inspection machinery then established, or is it intended that the inspection teams should actually be in existence and ready to function prior to any significant disclosures being made? I am doubtful whether the U.S.S.R. would be willing to accept the latter alternative, while there might be very serious risks for us in the former; the U.S. paper appears ambiguous on the question of which scheme should apply.

4. Another point on which I am concerned is the criterion set out in para. 4C (2) of WA-3825 to determine the magnitude of permissible defence spending. Surely to use national product alone is to weight the scale so much against the highly-populated have-not countries that it could not be taken seriously by them. A more realistic criterion, I should judge, would be one incorporating in a single formula two variables such as national product and per capita defence expenditure. I notice, however, that these criteria are put forward as "examples which could be suggested for discussion", so I presume that they do not fall under the ban in para. 5 of WA-3827 ("The U.S. representatives would not be in a position to go any further than the position set out in the U.S. paper.")

5. While, as indicated above, we recognize the difficulties of working out this proposal and how much remains to be done to fill in the details, you should be sure to make clear to the State Department that we welcome this initiative and agree with the general principles which underlie the proposal.

6. These and other questions could perhaps be discussed with Matthews. I think, however, that you should wait until we have had an opportunity to digest what information you may be able to get from Franks, and to give more thought here to the particular aspects of the U.S. paper which you might go into with Matthews, before approaching him.

NEW UNITED STATES PROPOSALS ON REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

1. As a first stage in filling the gaps in our information referred to in your message, I obtained from the British Embassy some information on the background of these proposals including the nature of the United Kingdom desiderata on this subject.

2. The consideration of new proposals on the reduction of armaments apparently originated from discussions which took place in the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers when they were working on a possible agenda for a meeting of Foreign Ministers earlier this year. In their talks in Paris, the Deputies of the 3 Western Foreign Ministers agreed that any discussion of the release from present international tensions would have to include the question of disarmament.

3. When efforts at convening the Foreign Ministers of the four powers were frustrated, United States and United Kingdom officials continued informal consultations on this question in Washington. Apparently about two months ago it was decided that preparations should be made for the submission of new proposals in the United Nations and it was agreed that United Kingdom and United States officials separately would study the problem and work out separate schemes on which they would then consult.

4. These talks apparently were confined to United States and United Kingdom officials on the "working level". Franks had one talk with Acheson some weeks ago on this question, but they have not been involved in substantive discussions. The United Kingdom and United States studies, although conducted separately, were based on a similar premise, namely, that the main object of the exercise was to gain initiative in the propaganda for peace in the United Nations. It was also assumed that there is no contradiction between the making of a genuine offer for the regulation and reduction of armaments and conducting a useful propaganda exercise. It was recognized that to be effective from a propaganda point of view, it was necessary to put forward a scheme which could be implemented by all nations concerned (in the unlikely event it were accepted in good faith by the Soviet Government).

5. The United Kingdom officials in their scheme, placed primary emphasis on the need for specific criteria which would govern the level of military manpower and armaments. General language, they thought, would be ineffective compared with the specific percentage cut proposed on more than one occasion by the Soviet Union. The United Kingdom scheme also referred primarily to the five great powers — the United Kingdom, United States, U.S.S.R., France and China. Their proposals apparently envisaged that there should be a five power parity in military manpower of 3 million for the west and 3 million for the east. Each of the five would be permitted to have roughly 1 percent to 1 1/2 percent of its population included in its armed forces with an absolute ceiling of one million or one and one-half million. Russia and China would be permitted a ceiling of say one and one-half million each; this ceiling would be balanced by permitting the United States one and one-half million effectives and France and the United Kingdom seven hundred and fifty thousand each. It was envisaged that limitations on the level of armaments would be worked out in relation to the manpower quantities indicated above. The United Kingdom plan also suggested that there should be a more concrete timetable governing the various stages of implementation, including procedures of verification and disclosure.

6. The British Embassy emphasized that these United Kingdom proposals never had any ministerial clearance. Since the change of government in London, it is doubtful whether they will be submitted for the consideration of ministers, since they differ markedly in conception from the more general but limited proposals which have now been approved by President Truman and Messrs. Acheson and Lovett.

7. Apparently on the United States side, objections were raised to including specific percentages or other figures on the grounds that this kind of detail should be left to subsequent negotiation, after it had been clearly established whether the Soviet Union was willing to co-operate to the extent of negotiating on the basis of a plan which provides for safeguards, including complete disclosure of existing armaments and armed forces accompanied by international verification.

8. Having in mind the record of the Soviet attitude in the discussions on the regulation and reduction of armaments, the more cautious United States attitude seems to be justifiable. It was, of course, acknowledged in the bilateral consultations in Washington, that there was a distinct possibility that the Russians might make the gesture of accepting the proposals on the reduction of armaments for their propaganda effect and then stall the detailed negotiations which would presumably have to follow.

9. The British Embassy has not received any new instructions on this matter since the change of government in London. It was thought not unlikely that the United Kingdom Government would agree to associate themselves with the sponsorship of the new proposals. The British Embassy realizes that there is a strong current of opinion in the United States, expressed in Congress as well as in organizations such as the American Association for the United Nations, which favors the United States taking the initiative in new proposals for disarmament. They referred to the resolutions submitted by Senator McMahon, as well as other Senators in the 82nd Session of Congress, on this question, as well as to the memorandum submitted by the American Association for the United Nations yesterday to the United States delegation to the General Assembly urging the United States Government to "put forward bold proposals" at the General Assembly for disarmament.

10. We were also told by the British Embassy that the United Kingdom Government has now obtained the consent of the United States Government to inform certain other Commonwealth Governments, namely, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa through the High Commissioners in London, of the discussions which have been going on. The French Government has been informed by the United States Government.

11. I think that in your message to me and in the memorandum given to the minister a false antithesis is included in describing the United States proposal as either "a genuine offer" or as "a propaganda exercise". I feel sure that the proposals are both genuine and designed for propaganda employment, and surely the best propaganda is based on a statement of intentions which one is ready to carry out if agreement is secured. I also think that it would be very difficult to persuade the State Department to eliminate all reference to the United Nations plan for control of atomic energy, since if this is not mentioned the Russians might use the proposal as another occasion for pushing their own alternatives.

NEW UNITED STATES PROPOSALS ON REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

The information in your message gives us a much clearer picture of the background of the new proposals. For our part, we have today been given by the U.K. High Commissioner's Office three telegrams from the C.R.O. including the text of the U.S. proposals and certain U.K. comments on them. The only new information thus obtained is given in the following quotation: "However, with a view to launching their programme to the greatest advantage, United States Government propose that shortly before the opening of the Assembly, the United Kingdom and French Prime Ministers should join with the President of the United States in issuing a tripartite statement foreshadowing the disarmament programme." With this in mind, and with our earlier comments as general guidance, you might now have a talk with Matthews about the subject and perhaps sound him out on whether such a statement is likely.

2. Incidentally, we agree with the point made in the first two sentences of paragraph 11 of your message WA-3860. Indeed, the false antithesis to which you refer was introduced inadvertently and arose from our uncertainty as to whether or not the United States really is ready to carry out the terms of the new proposal if agreement should be secured.

NEW UNITED STATES PROPOSALS ON REDUCTION OF ARMAMENTS

1. In conversation with Hickerson (who is handling this subject in the State Department rather than Matthews) he provided a good deal of further information today about the background and nature of the United States proposal and also about the way in which it is to be presented.

2. In outlining the philosophy behind the proposal Hickerson stressed two points. He emphasized first that, in the State Department's view, if there were to be an initiative of this general kind, it must be an honest initiative. It must be a proposal that the United States would be glad to see accepted. Although Hickerson, from past experience, was not sanguine that the Soviet Union would accept this proposal, he asserted that it had been very carefully considered and that the United States would be prepared to live with it if by any lucky chance it did prove acceptable. Secondly, Hickerson explained that it was believed in the State Department that progress towards disarmament could be made only if the problem of inspection could be solved. For that reason, they had put at the forefront of the United States proposal the necessity of "a progressive system for international disclosure and verification".

3. In tracing the history of the proposal, he said that the consultations with the British had grown both out of the meetings of the Deputies of the Council of Foreign Ministers (as I reported in my telegram No. 3860 of October 30th†) and also out of exchanges between the United States and United Kingdom representatives on the United Nations Committee of Twelve. Sir Pierson Dickson had discussed this subject with Hickerson when he was in Washington in September with Mr. Morrison. Early in October, a Foreign Office official had come to Washington and had worked on an early United States draft with officials in the State Department. As a result of this cooperation a joint (United States-United Kingdom) paper was produced about the middle of October, which had not, however, secured the approval of either government.

4. The chief difference between the earlier joint paper and the memorandum sent you under cover of our despatch No. 3825 of October 25th[1] was that in the earlier draft illustrative figures were included for sub-paragraphs 1 and 2 of paragraph 4C of the present paper. At that time it was intended that sub-paragraph 1 should read:

"Limiting the size of armed forces including para-military security and police forces to a fixed percent of population, say one percent, but subject to a ceiling for any country of an agreed maximum figure, say one million."

The percentage of national product proposed, in a similarly tentative way, as the ceiling in sub-paragraph 2 would have been five percent.

5. The Pentagon were unconvinced of the wisdom of including such illustrative figures at this early stage in the initiative, although they would have been prepared to see these figures used, if in fact negotiations with the Soviet Union developed. Mr. Acheson also was doubtful whether figures should be included. It was the President himself who took the decision to omit them. Those who have worked on this project in the State Department are inclined to regret their disappearance, since concrete figures, they think, might have added considerably to the propaganda effectiveness of the initiative. They are anxious, however, to make clear that the paper you have received represents the very farthest that the United States can go now; and I think you will agree that it shows a very considerable advance.

6. One other point worried Mr. Acheson. He was concerned lest the launching of this proposal should lead the public here and in other countries "up the garden path" and give them the impression that there had been some marked improvement in the international situation. There can be no such improvement, in his opinion, until the Soviet Union has shown some willingness to negotiate the outstanding political issues which now embitter its relations with the West. It was to meet this point of Mr. Acheson's that paragraph 6 of the present memorandum was inserted.

7. Hickerson provided a good deal of clarification of the way in which the proposed system of disclosure and verification would operate if it were ever accepted and put into practice. He said categorically that it was essential that agreement concerning the procedures for disclosure and verification should be reached and that inspection teams should actually be in existence before any disclosures were made. He also threw some light on what is meant by "a progressive system for international disclosure and verification". The idea would be to start with the easiest categories first. For example, it might be agreed that the number of training camps or the size of police forces should be the first data to be disclosed. The disclosure would proceed according to an ascending scale of sensitivity. This would mean that information concerning atomic weapons would be disclosed at a comparatively late stage although it would not necessarily be reserved for the very final stage. Indeed, information about nuclear activity would in all probability be spread over a number of stages. It might be proposed, for example, that information about output and reserves of fissionable materials should be disclosed relatively early; then information about refining capacity might be asked for; and so on until, ultimately, significant figures for the capacity of the various countries to produce nuclear fuel would be available. The counting of bombs by themselves would have little meaning.

8. In discussing the reference in paragraph 4D of the paper to the United Nations plan for the international control of atomic energy, Hickerson said firmly that, in spite of the phrase "unless and until a better and more effective plan can be devised", the United States Government has no other plan in mind. No decision has yet been taken as to what course should be pursued if the Soviet Union seemed inclined to accept all the other facets of the proposal with the exception of the United Nations plan for the control of atomic energy.

9. In your telegram No. 2096 of October 27th, you suggested that the use of national product alone as a criterion for setting a ceiling on permissible defence spending was unrealistic. Some explanations of sub-paragraph 4 (2) that Hickerson provided may help to remove this stumbling-block. He pointed out that, since it was proposed that production for military purposes should be restricted, so that it bore a direct relation to the amount needed for the armed forces, a cross rate, as it were, would be established between manpower and defence expenditure and this would provide an additional ceiling on defence spending. If this ceiling in the case of the United States, for example, were lower than the ceiling reached by taking a percentage of the national product of this country, the lower ceiling would prevail. He was unwilling, however, to have the formula proposed in the United States memorandum diluted by adding present per capita defence expenditure as a further criterion. Any such step would tend to freeze the relative state of military preparedness of the Soviet Union and the west in its present disequilibrium.

10. Preliminary soundings in Paris show that the French will probably be willing to join in sponsoring this proposal before the United Nations. No hint has yet been received from London of the British reaction. The State Department are anxious to have both French and British support, but will proceed without it if necessary. If it proves impossible for the British to associate themselves with the proposal, the State Department would prefer to launch it themselves rather than to be supported merely by the French. It is still hoped, however, that it may be possible for Truman, Churchill and Pleven to issue identical statements presenting the proposal about noon on November 7th. This statement would be, as it were, a précis of the paper which you have already received.

11. After that, it is intended that the following steps should be taken:

(a) Truman would deliver a "fireside chat" on the night of November 7th; and it is thought that Churchill and Pleven might make similar broadcasts.

(b) The next day Acheson, at an early stage in the general debate in the Assembly, would make a much fuller statement in which the whole of the memorandum which you have seen would be incorporated. He would also ask that this be placed on the agenda of the Assembly as a new and separate item.

(c) The British and French representatives would support Acheson before the Assembly, if they were by then in a position to do so.

(d) The General Committee would be asked to approve the United States request that this be placed as a new item on the agenda and to assign it to whichever of the Assembly committees is to be responsible for considering the report of the Committee of Twelve, i.e. either to the Political Committee or to the Ad Hoc Committee.

(e) In one or other of these committees this new proposal would be considered together with the report of the Committee of Twelve.

(f) When the report of the Committee of Twelve has been approved and when a new commission has been established in accordance with its recommendations, a formal resolution would then be introduced to refer this United States proposal to the new commission. At every stage in the procedure in the United Nations an effort would be made to draw out the Russians and to make them take up a position towards the proposal.

12. Hickerson concluded that he very much hoped they could count on Canadian support. In reply, he was merely told that this United States initiative had been warmly welcomed in Ottawa.

UNITED STATES DISARMAMENT PROPOSAL AND REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF TWELVE

The first committee will probably meet Saturday morning 17 November to agree on order in which items will be taken up. As soon as this is settled, it is expected that "disarmament" and "Committee of Twelve report" will be taken up together: This may begin Monday, 19 November.

2. My immediately following telegram gives text, as it stands at present, of United States draft for resolution on both items. It is expected that this will be sponsored jointly by United States, United Kingdom, and France, but the delegations have not yet agreed on a text. The text has therefore not yet been shown to other delegations, and we have only today been given this text in "special confidence" by United States delegation.

3. The main reservation of United Kingdom and French delegations concerns the advisability of highlighting detailed criteria to relate size of armed forces to populations. United Kingdom delegation thus far feel that these details should be left for debate inside the Commission. I understand that the French, who were not consulted much in advance, are concerned particularly at their dwindling population relative to Germany. The United Kingdom feels that there would be many other examples of concern which would be brought out in the general debate — for example, Israel worrying about much larger population of Egypt.

4. The United Kingdom delegation is also inclined to deprecate the provision in paragraph 4 of United States draft for twice yearly reports to Security Council and General Assembly or member governments, as they think that these reports would merely be statements of Soviet obstructions, and would lead to unnecessary and repetitious poisoning of atmosphere.

DISARMAMENT AND REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF TWELVE

Following is tentative text of draft resolution: Text Begins:

The General Assembly

Desiring to lift from the peoples of the world the burden of increasing armaments and the fear of war, and to liberate new energies and resources for positive programs of reconstruction and development,

Believing that the necessary means to this end is the development by the United Nations of comprehensive and coordinated plans, under international control, for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction to levels adequate for defense but not for aggression of all armed forces and all armaments, and for the effective international control of atomic energy to ensure the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only,

Recognizing that a genuine system for disarmament must include all kinds of armed forces and armaments, must be accepted by all nations having substantial armed forces, and must include safeguards that will ensure the compliance of all such nations,

Noting the report of the Committee of Twelve established by resolution 496(v), and especially its recommendation that the General Assembly establish a new commission to carry forward the tasks originally assigned to the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments,

1. Establishes an Arms Reduction Commission under the Security Council, having the same membership as the Atomic Energy Commission and the Commission for Conventional Armaments;

2. Dissolves the Atomic Energy Commission and recommends to the Security Council that it dissolve the Commission for Conventional Armaments;

3. Directs the Arms Reduction Commission to prepare a draft of a treaty (or treaties) for the regulation, limitation and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments. The Commission shall be guided by the following principles:

(a) In a system of guaranteed disarmament, there must be progressive disclosure and verification on a continuing basis of all armed forces — including para-military, security and police forces — and all armaments, including atomic.

(b) There must be effective international inspection to verify the adequacy and accuracy of the information disclosed.

(c) In working out plans for the regulation, limitation, and balanced reduction of all armed forces, and all armaments, the Commission should seek to formulate criteria of general application, which could be simply and clearly stated. The Commission might consider, among other criteria, whether in the case of armed forces the size of such forces should be related to population, and whether in the case of armaments the amount of such armaments should be related to national production, subject to maximum national figures for both armed forces and armaments.

(d) After formulating limits and restrictions for all armed forces and all armaments, and within these limits and restrictions, the Commission should consider methods of developing mutually-agreed national programs concerning the armed forces and armaments that each country would maintain.

(e) In formulating the draft treaty (or treaties) referred to above, the Commission should include provisions for the international control of atomic energy which would be no less effective than the United Nations plan in ensuring the prohibition of atomic weapons and the use of atomic energy for peaceful purposes only.

(f) There must be an adequate system of safeguards to ensure observance of the disarmament program, so as to provide for the prompt detection of violations while at the same time causing the minimum degree of interference in the internal life of each country.

(g) The treaty (or treaties) should be open to all States for adherence and must be ratified by at least those States whose military resources are so substantial that their absence from the program would endanger it.

4. Directs the Commission to commence its work not later than thirty days from the adoption of this resolution and to report at least twice a year to the Security Council and to the General Assembly, or to the members of the United Nations when the General Assembly is not in session;

5. Requests the Secretary-General to convene a conference of all States to consider any draft treaty (or treaties) prepared by the Commission as soon as the work of the Commission shall have progressed to a point where in the judgment of the Commission any part of its program is ready for submission to governments.

6. Requests the Secretary General to furnish such experts, staff, and facilities as the Commission may consider necessary for the effective accomplishment of the purposes of the present resolution. Text ends.

U.S. DISARMAMENT RESOLUTION

We have not yet had time to obtain the views of National Defence on the U.S. text given in your telegram No. 39. As the subject may come up for discussion, before we have an opportunity to do so, we are sending you now our own preliminary views.

2. We are favourably impressed by the United States draft resolution. It seems to us that the language and tone are such as to make it difficult for the Russians to reject the resolution and that the resolution can therefore be represented as a serious effort to launch disarmament discussions. This makes it good propaganda.

3. We suggest that, in debate, stress should be laid on the point that there is nothing in the resolution which conflicts with the terms of the disarmament resolution of December 14, 1946, which the Russians and all other members of the Assembly accepted. So far as we can see, the only substantial differences are the inclusion of a specific provision for the disclosure of atomic weapons and the suggestion of possible criteria to be applied in the regulation of national armaments and armed forces. The Russians have always wanted the disclosure of atomic weapons and the criteria mentioned are only suggestions and do not appear to be loaded against the Russians.

4. Some of the points made in the resolution of December 14, 1946, are omitted from the new U.S. resolution but we assume that if the Russians want these points included, the Western Powers would be willing to include them.

5. We are not impressed by the arguments against mentioning the criteria which are set forth in paragraph 3 of your telegram No. 38. If the criteria are not mentioned, the resolution will not constitute a very great advance over the resolution of December 1946.

6. The possible French and Israeli objections to the criteria would apply to any reasonable disarmament proposal and in effect represent opposition to any realistic disarmament scheme.

7. We note that the second criterion is now related to "the amount of armaments" rather than to "the portion of national production which could be used for military purposes". We are inclined to prefer the earlier wording. Presumably, it has been amended because of the fact that the United States spends much more per soldier in the maintenance of its armed forces (as distinct from armaments) than most of the other countries.

8. The unequivocal application of an upper limit both to the size of armed forces and the amount of expenditure is an improvement over the previous proposal.

9. The language in Paragraph 3(e) on atomic energy is well chosen since it gives the Russians no valid reason for objecting.

10. The language of paragraph 3(g) needs some tightening up. Instead of "must be ratified" it should read "should come into force when ratified".

11. We suspect that the provision that the Commission should report at least twice a year is designed to indicate that the Commission is expected to be an active body. A mere provision for an annual report might easily appear pessimistic concerning the progress of the work which the Committee is to undertake. Nevertheless, we recognize the force of the U.K. argument outlined in paragraph 4 of your telegram No. 38. Accordingly, we consider that the Commission might be required "to submit an annual report to the Security Council and to the General Assembly, and to make such other reports to the members of the United Nations as its progress shall warrant".

DISARMAMENT

In my memorandum of November 15 I gave you the United States draft, as it then stood, of the disarmament resolution, together with an indication of United Kingdom and French views, and a few comments of our own.

There have been a number of developments since then.

In telegram No. 50 of November 16 the Department sent us their preliminary comments on the United States draft. Copy attached.

Meanwhile the United States, United Kingdom and French Delegations have agreed on a revised text, which will probably be formally submitted Monday morning. Attached is a copy of this revised text.† The most significant changes from the earlier draft are:

(i) Paragraph 3(d) refers in a much more rigid manner to the United Nations plan for atomic controls, which it directs "should continue to serve as the basis unless and until a better and no less effective system can be devised". The Department had liked the relative flexibility of the earlier draft, and Mr. Heeney had even wondered in his memorandum of October 27 whether specific reference to the majority plan might not be superfluous in a context stressing adequate inspection and safeguards.

(ii) The explicit reference to criteria of percentages of population and national income, to which the United Kingdom and French had taken exception, has been dropped from the new text. The Department had welcomed this reference, as marking a realistic advance over the 1946 resolution.

COMMITTEE 1 — DISARMAMENT DEBATE

1. In opening the discussion of the three-power disarmament proposals yesterday morning, Acheson was at his best. In contrast to his statement in plenary, he refrained from so much as mentioning the Soviet Union and simply presented a thoroughly lucid exposition of the western proposals.

2. The only other delegate ready to speak was Moch who said little beyond recalling earlier French proposals for an arms census as a preliminary step towards reduction of armaments.

3. As the three power resolution was not circulated to delegations until Sunday evening, it is hardly surprising the debate had to be adjourned yesterday because no other speakers were ready. The smaller countries also want to hear first what the great powers have to say but neither Vyshinsky nor Selwyn Lloyd (United Kingdom) want to speak early in the debate. As I shall be leaving for Rome tomorrow afternoon, I shall speak tomorrow morning after the Czech representative. The representatives of Brazil, Peru, Haiti, and Iran spoke this morning after which the committee adjourned for lack of further speakers.

4. I expect Vyshinsky will bide his time until next week when he can point to the empty places of the NATO Foreign Ministers and say that they have left the disarmament discussion in the hands of their deputies, giving first place to their rearmament plans in Rome. At any rate, if his performance last Friday is any indication, Vyshinsky will not make the mistake of laughing at western proposals again.

5. I shall, in my statement, explain that there is no inconsistency between NATO defence plans on the one hand, and sincere western disarmament proposals on the other.

6. Both Acheson and Vyshinsky have spoken of the problem of stages and I shall be saying something about this too. In effect, western proposals in their present form might be interpreted as calling on the U.S.S.R. to disclose secret information in the early stages in return only for information, most of which is already published in the west, about military establishments, etc. Vyshinsky made effective play on this point, and opposed the whole concept of stages.

7. I am, in my statement, going to emphasize that acceptance of the principle of stages, as well as of the principle of effective international verification and control, is a test of any delegation's sincerity.[12] It is obviously ridiculous to propose, (as Vyshinsky did) that all information on all armaments, bombs and bases should be disclosed in one month, without time for verification. As Acheson said yesterday, no government should be asked to risk its national security upon the unsupported affirmation of another government. I shall add that on the particular details of each stage, our delegation's view is of course not rigid, and that if the Soviet delegation is seriously interested in disarmament we would be glad to consider carefully any sincere proposals on such details which they may care to put forward. I think it essential that the stages should provide at each step an equitable balance of risks and safeguards on both sides, so that at each step both sides should make disclosures of real and equivalent value. Thus by the mutual acceptance of limited and balanced risks, each sides' confidence in the agreed procedures and safeguards, and simultaneously our confidence in each other, will grow.

8. I am, of course, giving strong support to the three power proposals.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Paris, December 5, 1951

Dear David [Kirkwood]:

The disarmament debate is really depressing.[13] I think we helped to some extent in the Minister's speech in Committee One and also behind the scenes to loosen up the Americans and get them to take a much more flexible line in interpreting and explaining the Three Power proposals. Dr. Jessup and Harding Bancroft are, of course, easily convinced of this kind of approach, and so I believe is Mr. Acheson, but President Truman's inept launching of the proposals has been hard to catch up with in Paris. Perhaps the prevailing cynicism is only a reflection of the more profound discouragement of most people here who have had anything to do with the subject. If Vyshinsky shows the slightest sign of loosening up on his side, I think it would be possible for the Three Powers to go a good deal further than they have until now, but in the more or less private Four Power talks now being held nothing at all seems to be happening behind stonewall positions on both sides. If anyone in Ottawa has any ideas — official or unofficial — I wish you could let me know.

TRUSTEESHIP COMMITTEE OF THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Before the opening of the present session of the Assembly we had informal indications from United Kingdom sources here that at least some of the critical non-administering countries might be persuaded to adopt a more moderate line towards the administering authorities. Unfortunately, in its first four meetings, the Trusteeship Committee became involved in a series of procedural arguments which can have given little comfort to the "colonial" powers.

2. From the standpoint of the great majority of the Committee, South Africa is, of course, the villain of the piece. When the South African Delegation requested at the first meeting on November 14 that the item on South-West Africa be given second place in the Committee's agenda, this was a signal for a preliminary attack, led by the Cuban and Guatemalan representatives, on the South African position. It seemed to us that the South African request — based on Dr. Donges' desire to return early in December to his Cabinet duties in South Africa — was a reasonable one to which the Fourth Committee might well have acceded. But so unpopular are the South Africans in United Nations circles that it is futile for them to expect to have a favour granted without conceding some quid pro quo. In this case the critics used the South African request as an occasion for raising the question on granting hearings to representatives of the Hereros and other elements of the indigenous population of South-West Africa. This the South Africans bitterly opposed, and for a time it appeared that their request for the early consideration of this item would be rejected. The adjournment of the first meeting, however, enabled the United Kingdom Delegation to arrange a compromise whereby, in return for agreeing to the South African request, the Committee would resolve to treat the matter of granting hearings as a prior question, to be taken up before the first item on the Committee's agenda. This compromise was approved, and the Committee thereupon agreed without difficulty on the arrangement of the rest of its agenda (our telegram No. 46 of November 17).

3. The Committee then turned to the prior question of whether it should grant hearings to representatives of indigenous populations (U.N. documents A/C.4/SR.202, 203 and 204). A request for such a hearing from certain representatives of the Ewe peoples was readily approved, after the United Kingdom Delegation had stated its willingness that they should proceed to Paris and be heard as petitioners from a trust territory. A request for a hearing from representatives of the Hereros and other South-West African tribes, however, gave rise to heated controversy. The discussion centred on a nine-power draft resolution (U.N. document A/C4/190) introduced by Guatemala, proposing that the Fourth Committee should grant hearings to these representatives, and expressing the wish that the South African Government would facilitate their "prompt travel" from South-West Africa to Paris.

4. Sir Alan Burns, the United Kingdom Representative, pointed out that the Charter provided only for hearing and discussing petitions relating to trust territories; since South-West Africa was not a trust territory there was no provision whereby petitions from that territory could be heard by the United Nations.

5. This argument was subsequently developed by the South African Representative, Dr. Donges, who gave four reasons for opposing the nine-power draft resolution. In essence these were:

(a) that it substituted another authority (the Fourth Committee) for the Ad Hoc Committee set up by the General Assembly to consider the matter, and that it disregarded the specific instructions in resolution 449 (V) of the General Assembly as to how petitions from South-West Africa should be dealt with;

(b) that the Ad Hoc Committee had submitted in its report a number of proposals regarding the appropriate body to deal with petitions from South-West Africa; that the Committee's report was still to be considered; and that the adoption of the resolution might endanger the success of the Ad Hoc Committee's work;

(c) that the draft resolution conflicted with the Court's advisory opinion as to the procedures which should be employed with regard to reports and petitions from South-West Africa, and if passed would be a "slap in the face" to the Court, the General Assembly, the Ad Hoc Committee, and to South Africa itself;

(d) the passage of the draft resolution would be an "unwarranted slight" to South Africa.

6. Strong as the South African argument appeared to be from the legal point of view, it had little effect on the Committee, most of whose members did not attempt to refute the argument adduced by Dr. Donges and by the United Kingdom and Australian representatives, who spoke in his support. Judge Ingles (Philippines), however, claimed that there was a difference between, on the one hand, a petition to air grievances such as that provided for under Article 87 of the Charter and, on the other, an oral hearing such as that now requested by the representatives of South-West Africa; and that the Committee was entitled to consult all sources of information so as to form a fair opinion. Other delegations pointed to the precedent of the hearings on the Palestine question, and implied that the Committee would not be going beyond its authority in hearing representatives from South-West Africa.

7. On the whole, however, the argument in favour of granting the hearings was an emotional one, derived not so much from logic as from an active distrust of South African motives. When the vote was taken 37 delegations supported the resolution; only 7 countries (Australia, Belgium, France, the Netherlands, New Zealand, South Africa and the United Kingdom) opposed the resolution; while 7 more (Canada, China, Denmark, Israel, Norway, Peru and the United States) abstained.

8. The Canadian Delegation did not take part in the debate. The Canadian abstention, which was cast on the Minister's instructions, was based principally on the belief that at this early stage in the Committee's proceedings it would be impolitic for Canada to appear to stand firmly in the camp of the administering authorities on this issue. Moreover, although the legal case against the adoption of the resolution was strong, the Delegation considered that certain factors existed which weakened the South African position. For one thing, the Assembly had in the Palestine case granted hearings to representatives of a former mandated area, and had in 1949 granted a hearing to the Reverend Michael Scott, the designated representative of the South-West African peoples. For another, as the Philippine representative pointed out, the resolution, by proposing that a hearing be granted and by omitting mention of a petition, appeared to avoid the objection that it would be contrary to the Charter for the Committee to receive representatives from South-West Africa. Thirdly, there seemed to be some substance in the contention that since South Africa had shown no inclination to accept that part of the International Court's opinion dealing with petitions and annual reports, the Assembly was morally justified in consulting representatives from that territory as a means of obtaining fuller information on local conditions.

9. Our general conclusion from this procedural debate is that the South African Government has shown no signs of giving ground at this Session on the South-West African issue. Indeed, there are rumours current here, mainly in press circles, that the Malan Government will be so stung by the Fourth Committee's invitation to the South-West African chieftains as to walk out of the United Nations, or at least to repeat its 1949 boycott of the Fourth Committee.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

At a meeting which we attended yesterday together with representatives from Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, Dr. Donges, Chairman of the South African delegation, elaborated on the letter† which he sent on Saturday to the President of the Assembly regarding South West Africa. (Text of letter follows by air bag.)

Dr. Donges apologized for not giving the members of the "old Commonwealth" advance warning of South Africa's intention to defy the recent Fourth Committee resolution inviting the Hereros to appear before it. The French walkout on Friday had forced his hand. In his letter to the President he had reviewed South Africa's objections to the resolution and had stated that the South African delegation would "withdraw from further participation" in the work of the committee "pending review of the constitutionality of the resolution by the General Assembly".

2. Dr. Donges described this letter as "indicting the Fourth Committee before the highest authority" and as "throwing the onus on the President of the Assembly". His government had walked out of the Fourth Committee in 1949 but only after Reverend Michael Scott had been granted a hearing. This time they had felt it necessary to go a step further; they would stay out until the question was reviewed.

3. Asked how South Africa hoped to benefit by having the recent Fourth Committee resolution reviewed by the Assembly, Dr. Donges replied that if the "big guns" of the major administering powers took a strong line in plenary some of the critics might not vote as they had in the Committee. He had had no indication however whether the President would in fact act to have the matter reviewed, and he seemed to imply that he was not greatly concerned whether the President did so or not. He admitted that even if the matter were reviewed South Africa could hardly hope for a favourable outcome. If the Assembly reiterated the invitation to the Hereros, he could not say what South Africa would do.

4. Dr. Donges' attitude was one of quiet firmness and assurance. He was careful to point out that the South West Africa problem was only one symptom of the tendency towards unconstitutionality in the Fourth Committee and he appealed without success for ideas as to how the committee could be "brought to its senses".

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

1. My immediately following telegram contains present text of draft resolution on South-West Africa which is being privately discussed among delegations of Cuba, Ecuador, India, Pakistan, Thailand and the United States. This text, which is in a very preliminary stage, has been shown to us in strict confidence by United States delegation. Although it has not yet been tried out on South Africa, it now appears likely to be principal basis of discussion in coming debate on South-West Africa. United Kingdom are not participating in actual discussions at this stage but are active behind the scenes in preserving the moderate terms of this draft, on which however they would probably abstain.

2. It is too early to assess degree of support which this resolution may win. Present sponsors however represent influential cross section of Fourth Committee. United Kingdom and United States hope that by bringing in Cuba and Ecuador they will forestall some of the more militant Latin American criticism of South Africa. Asian support is virtually assured by inclusion of India and Pakistan in addition to Thailand whose representative, Prince Wan, was Chairman of ad hoc Committee on South-West Africa. Arab attitude is not yet known but one or more Arab delegations will probably be invited to attend meetings called by sponsors in next few days.

3. Donges is absent from Paris at the moment and no developments in South African position can be expected until his return later this week. It is, therefore, impossible to predict whether South Africans will take part in the Fourth Committee's discussion of this item or whether they will maintain position taken in their letter to Nervo (my telegram No. 104, of November 27). This letter, incidentally, has still not been officially released and Chairman of Fourth Committee has refused to be drawn into discussing it. It is now an open secret, however, that Hereros will not be permitted to come to Paris and this may precipitate a further argument at opening of debate.

4. Our preliminary reaction to substance of draft resolution is that it is probably the most feasible solution. It avoids violent condemnation of South Africa and gives Malan Government an opportunity to reconsider its attitude towards the very reasonable proposals of the ad hoc Committee. If you have any comments, we should appreciate them as promptly as possible, as draft resolution may be introduced in next day or two.

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

Following is text of draft resolution on South-West Africa referred to in my immediately preceding telegram. Text begins:

"The General Assembly,

BELIEVING that an agreed solution of the vexed question of South-West Africa would not only bring greater peace and harmony to the continent of Africa, but would contribute significantly to the relieving of tensions in wider areas of the world;

2. CONSIDERING that the general acceptance of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice of 11 July 1950 would greatly strengthen the rule of law and reason in international affairs and thus the defenses of the United Nations;

3. HAVING by Resolution 449(V) of 13 December 1950 accepted the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to South-West Africa;

4. HAVING established a committee of five consisting of the representatives of Denmark, Syria, Thailand, the United States of America and Uruguay to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning the procedural measures necessary for implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice;

5. HAVING authorized this committee, as an interim measure, to examine the report on the administration of the territory of South-West Africa covering the period since the last report, as well as petitions and any other matters relating to the territory that may be transmitted to the Secretary-General;

6. HAVING received the report of the ad hoc Committee on South-West Africa (A/1901, A/1901/Add.1, A/1901/Add.2, A/1901/Add.3);

7. NOTING that the Union of South Africa submitted to the ad hoc Committee on South-West Africa a proposal which the ad hoc Committee found unacceptable because it did not allow for an adequate implementation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice and because the proposal made no provision for the supervision of the administration of the territory of South-West Africa by the United Nations;

8. NOTING that the ad hoc Committee submitted to the Union of South Africa a counter-proposal based on the existing Mandates Agreement and providing for a procedure for the supervision of the administration of the territory of South-West Africa by the United Nations as nearly as possible analogous to that which existed under the League of Nations, and to the extent practicable, involving international obligations no more extensive or onerous than those existing under the League of Nations;

9. NOTING that the Union of South Africa, in reply to the ad hoc Committee's counter-proposal, was willing to resume negotiations only on the basis of its own proposal, and informed the committee that the Union of South Africa was unable to accept the principle of submission of reports on the administration of the territory;

10. NOTING with concern that the ad hoc Committee was unable to comply with the resolution of the General Assembly to examine the report on the administration of the territory of South-West Africa because no report was received and that no petitions were transmitted by the Union of South Africa;

11. RECALLING that the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice with respect to the territory of South-West Africa sets forth, inter alia, that

(a) The territory of South West Africa is a territory under the international mandate assumed by the Union of South Africa on 17 December 1920;

(b) The Union of South Africa, acting alone, has not the competence to modify the international status of the territory of South-West Africa, and that the competence to determine and modify the international status of the territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations;

(c) The Union of South Africa continues to have the international obligations stated in Article 22 of the Covenant of the League of Nations and in the mandate for South West Africa as well as the obligation to transmit petitions from the inhabitants of that territory, the supervisory functions to be exercised by the United Nations, to which the annual reports and the petitions are to be submitted;

12. COMMENDS the ad hoc Committee on South-West Africa for its earnest and constructive efforts to find a reasonable basis of agreement;

13. ENDORSES, in principle, as a minimum, the proposal of the committee, appended hereto; (see document A/1901 of October 8, 1951);

14. DEPLORES the fact that the Union of South Africa, in the course of the negotiations with the committee, while prepared to negotiate on the basis of certain articles of the mandate, indicated its unwillingness to give adequate expression to its international obligations with respect to South West Africa, and in particular with regard to the supervisory responsibility of the United Nations toward this territory;

15. DECLARES that since the Union Government cannot escape its international obligations by unilateral action, the United Nations cannot recognise as valid any measures taken unilaterally by the Union of South Africa, which would modify the international status of the territory of South West Africa;

16. APPEALS solemnly to the Government of the Union of South Africa to reconsider its position, and urges it to resume negotiations on the basis of the ad hoc Committee's proposal for the purpose of concluding an agreement providing for the full implementation of the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice; and urges it further to submit reports on the administration of the territory of South-West Africa and to transmit petitions from communities or sections of the population of the territory to the United Nations;

17. CONTINUES until the next regular session of the General Assembly the ad hoc Committee on South-West Africa, established by Resolution 449(V), and requests it to continue to confer with the Union of South Africa concerning means of implementing the advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice;

18. AUTHORISES the ad hoc Committee on South-West Africa, as an interim measure, and pending the completion of the negotiations with the Union of South Africa, and as far as possible in accordance with the procedure of the former mandates system, to examine reports on the administration of the territory of South-West Africa as well as petitions and any other matters relating to the territory that may be transmitted to the Secretary-General;

19. REQUESTS the ad hoc Committee to submit a report on its activities to the next regular session of the General Assembly". Text ends.

Following from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: The moderate terms of this draft resolution are indeed surprising considering the sharp tone of the debate up to the present time.

2. We would prefer the word "regrets" rather than "deplores" in paragraph 14. The interjection of this rather sharp word in an otherwise moderate but firm resolution may give satisfaction to the militant critics of South Africa. However, its inclusion would cause more bitterness while its deletion would not weaken the objective of the resolution.

3. The phrase "and any other matters" in paragraph 18 might well be deleted, since it could be construed as establishing obligations transcending those existing under the Mandate's system and thus going beyond the International Court's opinion.

4. You might suggest these two drafting amendments. However, even if they are not accepted, it seems to us that the Delegation might vote for the resolution.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA

Following for Mr. Pearson, Begins: We understand from United Kingdom delegation that the Commonwealth Relations Office may approach you in London regarding the Assembly's discussion of South-West Africa. You may therefore wish to have our assessment of the situation.

2. A number of minor changes have been made in text of draft resolution on South-West Africa quoted in my telegram under reference. The more significant of these changes are:

(a) Paragraph 14 — "Deplores" has been dropped in favour of "regrets", as we had suggested;

(b) Paragraph 17 — the first half of the paragraph now reads: "Reconstitutes until the next regular session of the General Assembly an ad hoc committee on South-West Africa consisting of the following members ..., and requests, etc." This change is due to Denmark's announced intention not to continue serving on Ad Hoc Committee, and to possible other changes in its membership.

3. The text as amended has now been tabled under the joint sponsorship of Cuba, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, Iraq, Philippines, Thailand, and the United States. The debate on this resolution began this morning. Indications are that some forty to forty-five delegations will support the joint draft if the present text remains substantially unchanged. The United Kingdom delegation, however, have received instructions to vote against paragraphs 13 and 15, to abstain on paragraphs 14 and 18 and to abstain on the resolution as a whole. Paragraph 13 is unacceptable to them because of the words "as a minimum", a phrase which in their view introduces an unnecessary restrictive element and might be prejudicial to the success of any future negotiations between the Ad Hoc Committee and South Africa. We share these misgivings, but we are less impressed with the other United Kingdom objections which are primarily aimed at softening the tone of the Resolution.

4. Australian delegation will in all probability abstain for much the same reasons as the United Kingdom. New Zealanders are undecided but are closer to voting in favour than to abstaining. Another probable abstaining delegation is Belgium, but Netherlands has spoken in support of joint draft.

5. While we regret the inclusion of the words "as a minimum" in paragraph 13, we are inclined nevertheless to vote in favour of the resolution as a whole and, if it is voted on paragraph by paragraph, to abstain rather than to vote against Paragraph 13. We have explored the possibilities of removing the words in question but have been informed by the United States delegation that any such proposed amendment would be almost certain to annoy certain of the sponsors who have been restrained with difficulty from making the resolution considerably harder than it is on South Africa. The words "as a minimum" were inserted as a compromise in return for the omission of four very objectionable paragraphs which some of the sponsors originally wanted. Moreover, it seems likely that further amendments in South Africa's favour would be unlikely to command sufficient support in the Committee, and indeed would probably open the flood-gates to amendments in the opposite direction.

6. We consider it desirable that the largest possible majority should be marshalled for the resolution. Moreover, despite absence of unanimity among older Commonwealth countries, we feel it would be regrettable if Commonwealth votes were split entirely on colour lines, with only India and Pakistan supporting the resolution. Another factor inclining us to vote in favour relates to the role which we traditionally play in attempting to exercise a moderating influence on the drafting of resolutions on subjects of this nature. This resolution, while firm, is surprisingly moderate. If now we nevertheless do not support it, our future bargaining power in matters of this kind will presumably be weakened.

7. If, therefore, the joint draft resolution is put to the vote in its present form, we propose to vote in favour, as suggested in a recent message from Ottawa, unless we receive instructions from you to the contrary. If a paragraph by paragraph vote were requested, we should favour abstaining on Paragraph 13.

8. The vote may possibly be taken on Monday but will more likely be postponed until Tuesday or later. Ends.[14]

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

My immediately following telegram gives text of additional draft resolution on South-West Africa sponsored by Cuba, Ecuador, Egypt, India and the Philippines. You will note that this draft refers to previous occasions on which the Assembly has expressed itself in favour of a trusteeship agreement for South-West Africa.

2. Although the commentary suggests that we should oppose a resolution similar to 449 B (V), we are inclined to think that the present draft is so worded as to be difficult to oppose. Instead of directly reiterating previous resolutions urging South Africa to conclude a trusteeship agreement, it simply reasserts that such an agreement would be the "normal" way of modifying the international status of the territory. In our view this proposition is tenable if not realistic. Moreover it is not entirely incompatible with the court's opinion that South Africa is not legally obliged to place South-West Africa under the trusteeship system.

3. On the other hand, while we do not feel that we should be justified in opposing the resolution, we are unwilling to support it for various reasons. For one thing our favourable vote might be wrongly construed as support for the thesis that South-West Africa should be placed under the trusteeship system. For another there would appear to be no potential profit in reasserting the sense of resolution 449 B (V) which is of course still valid. Thirdly, it might be prejudicial to the success of any future negotiations to draw attention to the trusteeship aspect of the problem on which South Africa has repeatedly shown itself to be adamant.

4. For reasons given above, we propose to abstain on the draft resolution when it is put to the vote unless we receive other instructions from you. Vote is likely to be taken on Wednesday.

5. We understand that United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, France and Netherlands intend to abstain. United States attitude is not known definitely but their choice appears to be between abstention and support for the resolution.

The following is text of additional draft resolution on South West Africa referred to in my immediately preceding message:

The General Assembly

Having by its resolution 449 B (V) of 13 December 1950 reiterated its resolutions 65 (I) of 14 December 1946, 141(II) of 1 November 1947, 227(III) of 26

November 1948 and 337(IV) of 6 December 1949 to the effect that the territory of South West Africa be placed under the international trusteeship system,

Having accepted the advisory opinion of 11 July 1950 of the International Court of Justice concerning South West Africa, which states inter alia that:

(a) The provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter are applicable to the territory of South West Africa in the sense that they provide a means by which the territory may be brought under the trusteeship system,

(b) The provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter do not impose on the Union of South Africa a legal obligation to place the territory under the trusteeship system,

(c) The Union of South Africa acting alone has not the competence to modify the international status of the territory of South West Africa, and that the competence to determine and modify the international status of the territory rests with the Union of South Africa acting with the consent of the United Nations.

Reasserts its position, expressed in resolution 449 B (V) of 13 December 1950, that the normal way of modifying the international status of the territory would be to place it under the international trusteeship system by means of a trusteeship agreement in accordance with the provisions of Chapter XII of the Charter.

SOUTH AFRICA AND UNITED NATIONS

Saw Forsyth this morning. He regards situation as very serious. South Africa's final decision on relations with United Nations will hinge on reaction of General Assembly to indictment of Fourth Committee's unconstitutional procedure which Donges is preparing to submit. If in the judgment of the Union Government this is not, repeat not, given reasonable hearing and reasonable acceptance by the Assembly, South Africa will withdraw from the Assembly at least, repeat at least, for this session. Temper of Cabinet roused and unanimous, and indications at the moment are that the government is not, repeat not, unduly concerned at the prospect of break with the United Nations.

Whatever the outcome of the Assembly debate, the prospect of satisfactory outcome of negotiations on the South African proposals to the ad hoc Committee, which at one time seemed fairly good, is now very bleak.

I gather that the issue of travel documents to Herero Chiefs by the Government is improbable.

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

By a vote of 39 (including Canada) to 5 (the Cominform bloc) with 8 abstentions (Australia, Belgium, Guatemala, Mexico, New Zealand, Peru, United Kingdom and Yugoslavia) the Fourth Committee adopted on December 11 an amended version of the draft resolution on South-West Africa[15] quoted in my telegram No. 138. Text of resolution as adopted by committee is given in my immediately following telegram.† You will note that in addition to changes noted in my message No. 172 the following amendments were made:

(a) The whole of paragraph 13 is deleted;

(b) The words "on the basis of the ad hoc committee's proposal" in original paragraph 16 are deleted and replaced by words "with the ad hoc committee" after "negotiations";

(c) Paragraph 11 is inserted between paragraphs 3 and 4 of original draft.

2. While voting in favour of resolution as a whole, we abstained on new paragraph 14 on ground that it seemed to carry implication that South Africa might act in bad faith.

3. Membership of re-constituted committee has not yet been determined. Denmark will require replacement, Syria may be replaced by another Arab state, but we understand Thailand, United States and Uruguay will probably accept re-appointment. Until membership is determined committee's resolution will not be sent to plenary. Further details follow.

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

There were some interesting sidelights to the approval by the Fourth Committee of the resolution on South-West Africa quoted in my telegram No. 193 of December 13 (No. 292 to London). The deletion of the original paragraph 13 in particular was achieved by a curious coincidence of conflicting motives. Those delegations, including Canada, which were anxious to keep the resolution as moderate as possible regretted the paragraph in question because of their fear that the phrase "as a minimum" would preclude the new ad hoc committee from considering any proposals more favourable to South Africa than those which the Union Government found unacceptable in 1951. It seemed unwise, however, to suggest removal of the words in question in view of the generally (group corrupt) attitude of the Fourth Committee towards South Africa. It came as a surprise, therefore, when just before the vote was taken the Dominican Republic and other delegations, for reasons diametrically opposed to ours, persuaded the sponsors to delete the whole paragraph. Underlying this move was the feeling that the Assembly would be making too much of a concession to South Africa if it were to endorse in principle the moderate proposals of the ad hoc committee.

2. As a result of this deletion and of the subsequent dropping, on Brazilian initiative, of the words "on the basis of the ad hoc committee's proposals" in paragraph 16, the resolution has been, in our view, somewhat stiffened. We thought it desirable that the Assembly should somewhat endorse the proposals of the ad hoc committee and for this reason we opposed the Brazilian motion. On a close vote, however, the committee agreed to the additional deletion with the result that there is now no obligation on the new ad hoc committee to take its predecessor's proposals as a point of departure or as a minimum basis in any future negotiations. The membership of the new committee may thus be of considerable importance and efforts are being made by the Americans and other friendly delegations to ensure that a satisfactory replacement for Denmark is found. It is, however, a good omen that Prince Wan of Thailand will almost certainly continue as chairman and that the United States is willing to serve again. Whether or not the Union Government will agree to resume negotiations with the ad hoc committee is another question, the answer to which doubtless depends on the result of Dr. Donges' forthcoming conversations in South Africa.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

SECRET [Ottawa], December 15, 1951

In the absence of the High Commissioner for South Africa who is in Montreal on a short visit, the Secretary of his Office, Mr. Endemann called to enquire whether you would wish to receive Mr. Roberts on Monday, December 17, to discuss with him the question of the temporary withdrawal from the General Assembly of South Africa, as a result of recent developments in the Fourth Committee. Mr. Endemann was told that since it was likely that the Session might not be over by Monday, you would probably be very busy. He said that he was sure Mr. Roberts would be happy if I were to receive him in your stead.

2. You might consider it profitable that I see Mr. Roberts at this stage. It would possibly be advantageous to clarify with him our position on the matter. It seems to me that South Africa should be told, in a friendly way, that we cannot see what they can gain by burning their bridges and that they are placing their friends in a very awkward position. The problem of South West Africa is bound to remain on the Agenda and this withdrawal, even if only temporary, does not solve anything but rather embitters those who have been critical of South Africa's attitude.

3. I could point out that as far as Canada is concerned we have exercised great restraint at the Assembly and will certainly be willing to continue to do so; our role, however, is being made much more difficult by the intransigent attitude of the Malan Government. Because of our Commonwealth connections, we hope that the South African Government will not take any step which would make it more difficult for them eventually to reach an amicable settlement of the South West African problem.

4. The general tenor of the debate at the Assembly this year clearly indicates the uneasiness of many Members towards colonial problems. It is only by a very cautious policy on the part of those countries less directly concerned that such issues can eventually be solved without serious consequences. Any division between the Western nations on those problems weakens the Western World generally and strengthens correspondingly the Communist line.

5. It seems that the only bit of constructive advice which can be given at this stage to Mr. Roberts is to let him know that we hope very much that the South African Government will find its way clear to maintaining its Delegation at the United Nations Assembly after the Christmas recess, at least to participate in the work of all other Committees of the Assembly but the Fourth.

6. I am attaching a copy of Dr. Malan's statement on South Africa's withdrawal.[16]

SOUTH-WEST AFRICA

Question of membership of reconstituted ad hoc Committee on South-West Africa may be taken up tomorrow when Fourth Committee will hold its last meeting before Christmas. As you know, Denmark has already withdrawn from ad hoc Committee and additional changes have been rumoured. Secretariat feels that if this matter can be cleared up before Christmas there will be less likelihood of other undesirable changes later. Chairman of Fourth Committee is therefore considering proposing that Norway should replace Denmark on ad hoc Committee and that other members (Syria, Thailand, United States and Uruguay) should be reappointed.

2. This would obviously be the best solution if it could be pushed through. United States delegation, however, is under instructions to make it known that United States will be unable to accept re-appointment. Reason given is that United States has made as much of a contribution as it can to settlement of the dispute and that it would have no new ideas to put forward. United States delegation has therefore asked French if they would be willing to fill vacancy caused by United States withdrawal. Americans realize, however, that even if French were willing, which is regarded as unlikely, Fourth Committee would probably not agree to a second European member. We have accordingly been asked whether Canada would be available "as a second line of defence" if France is unwilling or unacceptable.

3. In reply to this approach we said that our present instructions would not permit us to accept membership but that while we had no reason to think that these instructions would be changed we would refer the matter to you for decision. We also pointed out that we could hardly expect to receive your views before to-morrow's meeting and added that if the matter arose we should have to decline nomination, unless we had specific instructions from you.

4. Following this conversation Americans were undecided whether or not to ask Secretariat to drop membership question until after Christmas. If Chairman insists on proposing list of members including United States, United States delegation may reserve until after Christmas its decision on accepting re-appointment. In this case we might again be approached, possibly through our Embassy in Washington. Our impression is that if no other suitable candidate can be unearthed United States will probably agree in the end to serve again.

5. As Americans are anxious to have our final views on this question, we should appreciate earliest possible confirmation or otherwise of previous instructions to the effect that Canada cannot accept appointment to ad hoc Committee. In the meantime we shall, of course, undertake no, repeat no, commitments.

6. Our own view is that we should not, repeat not, accept nomination. You might even wish to urge the United States, through Washington, to continue, since if the United States washes its hands of the problem, the possibility of a solution will become more remote.

Note du chef de la Direction du Commonwealth

Memorandum by Head, Commonwealth Division

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 21, 1951

THE UNDER-SECRETARY'S INTERVIEW WITH THE HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

At the request of the High Commissioner for the Union of South Africa, he was received by the Under-Secretary at 4:00 p.m., December 17. The Head of the Commonwealth Division (C.A. Ronning) was present at the interview.

2. The High Commissioner stated he did not expect any official information regarding the attitude of the Government of Canada with respect to the situation that had developed between South Africa and the United Nations. He hoped, however, that there would be no objections to an unofficial discussion as he had received a telegram instructing him to wire his Government concerning the reaction of the Canadian Government and the reaction of the Canadian public to this development.

3. The Under-Secretary replied that he was certainly willing to have an unofficial discussion about the whole matter. He had no hesitation, however, in informing the High Commissioner, on an official basis, that the Canadian Government was deeply concerned about the matter. He expressed the hope that the Union of South Africa would take no irrevocable steps which would result in any permanent withdrawal from the United Nations and would see its way clear, in view of the tense international situation, to return as soon as possible to participate in the activities of the United Nations.

4. The High Commissioner explained that, while he had not had time to give study to all of the information which he had just received from his Government, he was of the impression that the withdrawal was temporary and was of a limited nature.

5. It was pointed out to the High Commissioner that Dr. Malan's statement indicated that the withdrawal was from all discussions, with the exception of disarmament and the Korean Armistice talks. Upon re-reading the section of Dr. Malan's statement dealing with this subject the High Commissioner agreed that this was the situation. The Under-Secretary thereupon suggested that it would have been preferable to have decided to continue discussions on all subjects with the exception of the South West African question in Committee Four if the Union of South Africa desired to indicate its disapproval of the resolutions passed by that Committee.

5. The High Commissioner brought with him a clipping, copy of which is attached, of an editorial published in The Ottawa Citizen of December 17. He was very much disturbed at the tone of this editorial which he said had completely distorted the facts. He had been prepared to report to his Government that the attitude of the Canadian press and public opinion were friendly and favourable to South Africa until he read this editorial which was evidently prejudiced and weighted against South Africa's position and was most disturbing. The High Commissioner then went on to a report of the liberal and friendly policy which the South African Government had adopted to the natives of South-West Africa and explained that the attitude of the Hereros was due to the cruel treatment which had been administered to them by the Germans prior to 1918.

6. The High Commissioner expressed the surprise of his Government that the Canadian Delegation to the United Nations had changed its attitude to South Africa in view of the very friendly and sympathetic attitude expressed by Mr. Pearson on a number of occasions.

7. It was explained to the High Commissioner that the Canadian Delegation had not changed its position. They had been concerned about the increasing unfriendliness to South Africa and had attempted to restrain members of the Committee who had been demanding censure in strong and offensive terms. The Canadian Delegation had felt that the stiffening of the attitude of the Malan Government was making this role more difficult to carry out. The Canadian Delegation had participated in the toning down of the resolution which "regrets" the unwillingness of South Africa to give adequate expression to its international obligations with respect to South-West Africa. The Canadian Delegation had been instrumental in substituting the word "regrets" for the original term "deplores". After having obtained this modification the Delegation supported the resolution as a whole. The Delegation had abstained on paragraph 14 of this resolution since this paragraph seemed to carry the implication that South Africa might act in bad faith. The Canadian Delegation was aware of the complexities of the situation that existed in South Africa and was most anxious that a friendly relationship should exist between South Africa and other members of the Commonwealth and the United Nations.

8. The High Commissioner continued his discussion with Ronning after the interview with the Under-Secretary had been concluded. In this discussion, the High Commissioner described in detail the successful treatment of the natives of South-West Africa by the Union of South Africa. He stated that the great majority of the natives were not only satisfied but enthusiastic about the type of treatment they had received. The Hereros, as a result of the treatment by their former masters, the Germans, had developed a hatred for all white people and their attitude was an exception to the general rule. He said that he was privately of the opinion that the representatives of the Hereros should have been sent to Paris and that they should have been accompanied by a delegation of representatives from the satisfied tribes. He was certain that if this had been done the members of the Fourth Committee would have received a good impression of the policy of the South African Government in dealing with the natives of South-West Africa.

9. The High Commissioner said that his Government had been "shocked" by what they considered to be a drastic change in the attitude of the Canadian Delegation. His Government accepted the opposition and criticism of the many member nations of the United Nations which had made little or no contribution to the activity of the United Nations and was not disturbed or concerned about their attitude. When nations like Canada, the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, the Scandinavian countries and Holland voted against South Africa, however, it was most disturbing. His Government had received a "rude shock" when the Canadian Delegation had voted in favour of the resolution which "regrets" South Africa's "unwillingness to give adequate expression to its international obligations".

10. When it was suggested to the High Commissioner that the vote of the Canadian Delegation prevented the accusation that in issues of this sort a colour line is drawn across the Commonwealth, he replied that such resolutions served chiefly to antagonize South Africa and to arouse doubts as to the desirability of remaining in the United Nations. When it was asked if South Africa thought that the annoyance which it felt over resolutions dealing with a local situation warranted the serious consequences of withdrawal from the United Nations, the High Commissioner agreed that South Africa could not afford to withdraw. He added, however, that these provocative resolutions made it very difficult to control the strong emotions which had been aroused in South Africa. As long as such resolutions were supported only by the nations whose opinions South Africa did not regard highly, it was not a matter of too great concern but when countries like Canada supported these nations his Government was indeed greatly disturbed.

11. The following day the High Commissioner telephoned to say that he was reporting to his Government that the interview of the previous afternoon had clarified his understanding of Canada's attitude. He would inform his Government that in "reading between the lines" of his notes on the interview, he had received the impression that, while Canada considers the Union of South Africa to be important to the United Nations, it was even more important during this period of international tension to "close ranks" and not play into the hands of those who predict and work for "the disintegration" of the free nations. The Canadian Government, therefore, is concerned that South Africa should not take any irrevocable action that would lead to the Union's withdrawal from the United Nations. The Canadian Delegation had not changed its attitude to South Africa. It had been instrumental in toning down a resolution which was supported in the hopes that a basis for compromise might be found. Canada is anxious that South Africa should take no action to weaken the United Nations, especially during this period of crisis.

FINANCING OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED AREAS[18]

At this morning's session of Committee Two the committee adopted, with 28 votes for, 20 against and 10 abstaining, a joint resolution submitted by the delegations of Burma, Chile, Cuba, Egypt and Yugoslavia. The operative part of this resolution is as follows:

"REQUESTS the Economic and Social Council to submit to the General Assembly at its seventh regular session a detailed plan for establishing, as soon as circumstances permit, a special fund for grants-in-aid and for low-interest long-term loans to under-developed countries for the purpose of helping them, at their request, to accelerate their economic development and to finance non-self-liquidating projects which are basic for their economic development;

FURTHER requests the Economic and Social Council, in implementing paragraph 11, to prepare for consideration by the General Assembly at its seventh regular session a series of recommendations concerning:

(a) The size, composition and administration of the fund and, with respect to administration, keeping in mind that the creation of a new international organization should be considered only if a careful examination of the functions of existing organizations proves that the required functions cannot be carried out by them;

(b) The manner in which the contributions to the fund will be collected, keeping in mind the desirability of universal participation and the utilization of any savings that may accrue from any programme of disarmament, as one of the sources of contributions;

(c) The character of the contributions of states members of the United Nations and of those which are not members;

(d) The policies, conditions and methods to be followed in the making of grants and loans from the special fund to under-developed countries;

(e) The principles which countries receiving grants and loans from the special fund should observe;

13. REQUESTS the Secretary-General to assist the council in carrying out the responsibilities placed upon it by this resolution;

14. INVITES governments to make suggestions to the Economic and Social Council with respect to the recommendations mentioned in paragraph 12, above."

2. This resolution calls for the Economic and Social Council to prepare for the next session of the General Assembly recommendations concerning the establishment of an international developmental authority. You are already in possession of a statement made before Committee Two by Mr. Bourget on November 27th. In this general debate, and in subsequent interventions, we made it clear that Canada did not favour the establishment of such an organization at this time and that our commitments were such that we would not be in a position to contribute funds. Together with the United States and some of the Western European delegations we tried to induce the under-developed areas to accept an alternative resolution from Brazil and Greece calling for approval of the action taken at the last session of ECOSOC and instructing the Secretary-General to carry out certain additional studies concerning the financing of economic development. This resolution was also passed, but the adoption of the joint resolution referred to above renders it largely ineffective.

3. The states supporting the joint resolution came largely from the Latin American, Arab and Far Eastern blocs. Those opposing, in addition to ourselves and the United States, were the Western European states, the other Commonwealth countries (with the exception of India and Pakistan) and Brazil, Turkey, Israel, Greece, Liberia and Iceland. The Soviet bloc and certain of the Central American Republics abstained.

4. There has been a long and active discussion of this question in Committee Two at this assembly. Prior to the vote this morning Congressman Mansfield, the United States delegate, in one of the frankest speeches ever made in Committee Two, made it absolutely clear that his country was not prepared to make any contribution to any such project at this time and he appealed to other states not to risk the United Nations integrity by adopting an unrealistic and illusory resolution. Nevertheless Dr. Santa Cruz of Chile, who is the driving force behind this project, was able to rally a substantial majority for the resolution.

5. This resolution appears to us to be significant for two reasons. Firstly, it opens the door for the establishment of an international developmental authority to which we are opposed in principle at this time. Although the sponsors said they appreciated the fact that no funds would be forthcoming for the present, we are convinced that it will not be long before they press for contributions from the industrialized nations. In the second place, the resolution was adopted without the support of any of the major powers and with all of the North Atlantic community and other responsible powers in opposition. At previous meetings of ECOSOC and at previous assemblies the under-developed areas had responded to an appeal from the industrialized nations to exercise restraint and realism in considering this question.

6. The congressional members of the United States delegation are very much upset at this turn of events. They feel it will further antagonize public opinion in the United States and seriously reduce the prospects of the under-developed countries receiving aid in the future from Congress. It will also debase the currency of United Nations resolutions.

7. This resolution is subject to approval by plenary. With the above considerations in mind the United States, in plenary, will try to invoke article 18, sub-paragraph 2, of the charter so as to have this resolution require a two-thirds majority at the plenary stage. In addition, the United States will seek to influence certain delegations to withdraw their support by making representations here and in the various capitals. In this latter connection the United States delegation have suggested the possibility that Canada might reinforce their representations. We would appreciate your comments on both aspects of this strategy.

FINANCING OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED AREAS

Johnson went to see the Secretary-General yesterday to point out the Canadian concern about the over-all implications for the United Nations of the decision taken in Committee Two to establish an international developmental authority. He stressed that Canada was looking at this from the point of view of the future of the organization rather than from a strictly national point of view. He pointed out that he felt Mr. Lie and the whole Secretariat would share Canada's desire to avoid any possibility of compromising the United Nations' reputation or debasing the currency of its resolutions. He also pointed out that the United Nations should take a reasonable approach to the use of the majority principle, and that states supporting decisions should always bear in mind the possible impact of such decisions on the minority. This is particularly important in those fields where decisions can only be translated into action by the financial support of all governments.

2. Johnson did not suggest that the Secretariat should depart from its traditional course of impartiality; but many of the under-developed countries, lacking sufficient staff and background, may not be entirely aware of the far-reaching consequences of this decision. The Secretariat in the past has always been in close contact with all delegations and they have always been helpful in supplying factual advice wherever necessary. Johnson stressed his hope that in any discussions, private or otherwise, concerning the establishment of an international developmental authority, the members of the Secretariat would give full recognition to the consequences that may be involved for the United Nations if this program is approved in plenary.

3. We have been in part prompted to approach Mr. Lie because we have good reason to believe that some members of the Secretariat are actively campaigning in favour of establishing an IDA.

4. Mr. Lie was sympathetic, but of course made no commitment other than to speak along a very general line to the Secretariat. He also confirmed our hope that this item would not appear on the plenary agenda until after Christmas.

5. Mr. Lie expressed the opinion that he did not think that the President of the Assembly, because of Latin American support for this resolution, would rule that it was a decision which would require a two-thirds majority in plenary.

6. In addition to the advice requested in Paragraph 7 of our telegram No. 201, we should also like to know what will be Canada's attitude at the next meeting of ECOSOC if this resolution is adopted by the General Assembly? There seems to be a split in opinion at the present in the United States delegation as to whether they should agree in such circumstances to serve on any working party at ECOSOC. The United Kingdom have not made up their minds on this point as yet either.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 19, 1951

Dear Mr. Deutsch,

I attach a copy of a draft telegram addressed to the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly, in reply to their telegram No. 201 of December 13th on financing of economic development. As you will see, we are pretty strongly opposed to the manoeuvre which the U.S. intends to try by invoking Article 18[19] of the Charter. It seems to us that there are really no convincing arguments for calling this resolution important within the meaning of Article 18; an attempt to do so would be an obvious trick; and in any event there is not much reason to think that any of the twenty-eight countries which supported the resolution in Committee will vote in favour of the application of Article 18 knowing that the requirement of a two-thirds majority will almost certainly kill the resolution.

We have discussed the Committee's resolution and the telegram from the Delegation, and the view of this Department is that we ought to do no more than is outlined in paragraph 3 & 4 of the attached draft reply.

We do not know yet when this question is coming up in Plenary, but I should be grateful if you could look over our draft reply and let me know as soon as you can whether you have any comments to make or revisions to suggest. Perhaps you would telephone Margaret Meagher or myself when you have considered the draft.

Yours sincerely,

B.M. MEAGHER

Draft Telegram from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Delegation to United Nations General Assembly

[Ottawa], December 19, 1951

Reference: Your telegram No. 201 of December 13.

FINANCING OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

1. We are concerned over the U.S. intention to invoke Article 18 of the Charter in relation to the draft resolution on financing of economic development. In its present form the resolution calls only for a paper plan to be drafted by ECOSOC, and while we are strongly opposed to this, it would in our view be extremely difficult to justify the position that resolutions of this type should be regarded as important within the meaning of Article 18. In our opinion the constitutional integrity of this article should be carefully guarded, and we are reluctant to see it used for tactical purposes. We have been unable to find any precedent for invoking Article 18 on economic questions and while we do not know the arguments which the U.S. have in mind it seems unlikely to us that they can make a convincing case. Unless they can do so it is our present opinion that you should vote against the procedural motion.

2. We are disturbed over the adoption of the economic development resolution in Committee II, and would of course be pleased to see it defeated in Plenary. In the light of the clear statements of Canadian policy given on several occasions and most recently by Mr. Bourget in Committee II and Mr. Stone in the joint Second and Fifth Committees, we are doubtful if any further action we take will be of much avail. It must be assumed that the leaders of the under-developed countries have taken up their positions in the full knowledge of the objections held by the industrialized and potentially contributing countries. While we appreciate that this sort of high pressure resolution can further antagonize public opinion in the U.S. we are also conscious of the fact that the governments of the under-developed countries are equally sensitive to public opinion in their own territories. With this in mind they would naturally find it extremely difficult to back down at this stage.

3. For the reasons given above we would not be willing to try to bring any pressure on governments through diplomatic channels. There are, however, two lines of action open to us which might possibly accomplish some good and which would, in any event, do no harm. The first is for you to continue to try to persuade some of the delegations concerned, of their lack of wisdom in pushing through this resolution by force of votes. Secondly we propose to telegraph our missions in certain under-developed countries to explain to governments the Canadian policy in regard to economic development and the reasons for our opposition to the present resolution. We do not intend to urge these governments to change their votes but they might be influenced by a full explanation of our position. Moreover this action might help to offset any ill will resulting from our negative vote on the resolution now before the Assembly.

4. We have been considering the attitude we should take at ECOSOC if this resolution carries. Since we are opposed to the establishment of the plan, for the reasons you have already explained, our present intention is to decline to participate in any steps from now on, except to explain our attitude in the general debate in the Committee and to support any move to ask the General Assembly to reconsider its decision. We would not act on any subsidiary body appointed to draft the plan, and we would abstain on all votes connected with its formulation. If all the potential contributors were to follow the same line, it would of course effectively demonstrate the impracticability of the whole scheme. You might discuss this with the U.S. delegation and if you think wise, you might also hint to the under-developed countries that we might well be forced, regretfully, to follow a policy of non-participation.

5. Should the discussion on economic development be reopened in Plenary at this Session of the Assembly, we think it would be preferable if Canada were not to take part in the debate.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], December 22, 1951

Dear Mr. Deutsch,

I understand that your Department is of the opinion that the draft telegram which we prepared here on financing of economic development is a bit on the weak side. I do not think there is any real difference between us on this matter. We are fully conscious in this Department of the objectionable features of the resolution before the Assembly, and would certainly not wish to leave the impression with the under-developed countries that we are wavering or that the adoption of this resolution would soften us up.

In telephone conversations with Margaret Meagher, Simon Reisman made three specific suggestions for revision. The first of these was to rephrase the second paragraph of the draft telegram, in order to remove any suggestion that we were taking a middle position between the United States and the under-developed countries. The second was to delete the final paragraph in order to leave the Delegation free to take part in a discussion, should the subject be reopened in Plenary. The third was to instruct the Delegation to make known publicly and formally the Canadian intention to pursue a policy of non-participation should the resolution be adopted.

To meet your first objection I would suggest that the second part of paragraph 2 be revised to read as follows:

"We appreciate that this sort of high pressure resolution can further antagonize public opinion in the U.S., but we doubt whether the governments of the underdeveloped countries having gone so far, and being also sensitive to public opinion in their own territories, are likely to back down at this stage".

We think it useful to make this point in order to remind the Delegation that the power of public opinion is an important factor with the delegations of the underdeveloped countries as well as with the U.S. and that the Delegation should not lose sight of this particular difficulty.

I am inclined to agree with your suggestion to delete the final paragraph so that the Delegation may be free to join with others, if they think it useful, in a final attempt to kill the resolution. As you know, the advice to the Delegation to refrain from further statements was included tentatively, and we intended to draw this point to the particular attention of the Minister. It is a suggestion from Mr. Lesage, who has pointed out that there has been a good deal of adverse comment in the French language press on the Canadian statement given in Committee 2. I gather that the burden of the argument is that we have much too great an unbalance between our defence expenditures and our foreign economic aid programmes. We must, of course, bring Mr. Lesage's suggestion to Mr. Pearson's attention but this can be done in a covering memorandum, and the present paragraph of our draft telegram deleted for the moment.

I do not think our Delegation ought to say in a formal statement at this stage that we intend to pursue a policy of non-participation if the majority forces this resolution upon us. The danger here is that we do not yet know whether the U.S., U.K. and others are prepared to go this far, we do not have time to discuss the merits of this plan of action with Washington and London, and we would not care to be the only country to take this line. Apart from any other objection, it would not be a particularly effective threat if it came from Canada alone. I hope that your point can be met by adding the following to the end of the present paragraph 4 of our draft letter:

"Unless other countries in our position, including the U.S. and the U.K. are prepared at this stage to announce similar intentions, you should not go on record in the Assembly with a firm statement of our proposed policy. However, if you think it would be useful you could indicate that adoption of the present resolution might have such results."

Attention Mr. A.F.W. Plumptre[20]

Dear Sir:

I am referring to your letter of December 22nd and to our conversations concerning the draft telegram on the subject of financing economic development. The modifications proposed in your letter of December 22nd go some distance towards meeting our point of view. We feel that in its general tone the draft telegram is much too indifferent on the position which the delegation should take when this matter is considered further. We believe that this is inconsistent with the reality of our position, and the firm view expressed by our delegation when this matter was being discussed in Committee Two.

We regard the effort to railroad through a resolution for the establishment of an International Development Authority, against the opposition of all the responsible countries, as a most serious development for the United Nations.[21] As a matter of procedure and organization it is entirely inappropriate for the small countries to use their voting majority to compel the industrialized countries to participate in a programme of grant assistance of the type proposed.[22] Moreover, on the substance of the resolution, we firmly believe that grant assistance handled through an International Development Authority in the manner proposed is neither a desirable nor an effective method for achieving economic development. I know that you share these views and we would agree fully that the Canadian Delegation would not wish to leave the impression with the underdeveloped countries that we are wavering.

FINANCING OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES

As you know, the Second Committee of the General Assembly has adopted a resolution calling upon ECOSOC to draw up a detailed plan for the establishment of an international development authority to finance economic development. The vote was 28 in favour, 20 against and 10 abstentions. The Delegation in telegram No. 201 of December 13th (copy attached) has asked for instructions, particularly on a United States request that we support them in an attempt to have the resolution voted upon in Plenary under Article 18 of the Charter (requiring a two-thirds majority) and that we make representations through diplomatic channels to governments of the sponsors and supporters of the resolution.

I attach for your signature, if you approve, a telegram to the Delegation in reply to their request for guidance.[24] This telegram has been cleared with the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada.

I should point out that Mr. Lesage has informed us that there has been considerable adverse criticism in the French language press on the stand taken by Canada in Committee 2, on the grounds that Canadian defence expenditures are greatly out of balance with our contributions towards foreign economic assistance programmes. Mr. Lesage was of the opinion that in the light of the attitude taken by certain Quebec newspapers, we should advise the Delegation not to make any further statements in the General Assembly in opposition to this resolution. The Department of Finance feels very strongly that the Delegation should be left free, and indeed should be encouraged, to cooperate with other like-minded delegations in putting up a common front against the resolution, in the hope that it can still be killed. We

Deutsch phoned me on the morning of Dec. 26. When Deutsch spoke to me he did not, as I recall, emphasize or even mention his dissatisfaction with the general tone of the telegram. A.F.W.P[lumptre]. Dec. 28/51 share the views of the Department of Finance in this respect, and think that it might give rise to a false impression if Canada were to remain silent in a Plenary discussion in which the United States and other countries in our position were to participate.

In paragraph 2 of the attached draft telegram reference is made to our intention to explain our position to certain governments. Attached for your consideration is an Aide-Mémoire which, if you agree, we shall send by telegram to our Missions in the countries listed in the Aide-Mémoire.

Aide-mémoire

Aide-Mémoire

Ottawa, December [n.d.], 1951

"The Government of Canada wishes to convey to the Government of (x)[25] the reasons why the Canadian Delegation to the General Assembly of the United Nations cannot support the resolution on financing the economic development of under-developed countries adopted on December 13, 1951 by the Economic and Financial Committee.

2. "The Government of Canada has, in many practical ways, supported the aspirations and efforts of the under-developed countries in raising their production and the standard of living of their people. It has contributed, both financially and in other ways, to the Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance of the United Nations. It has given similar support to the Colombo Plan for Co-operative Development in South and South-east Asia. It has been an active supporter of the International Bank, both in the shaping of policy and in the provision of capital. These practical steps have been taken despite the growing burden of defence expenditures in this country.

3. "The defence obligations assumed by the Government of Canada are absorbing about half of a greatly increased national budget. They are interfering with the normal operation of the Canadian economy and are producing difficulties for the Canadian people. Accordingly it would not be possible for the Canadian Government at present to contemplate opening up a broad new field of assistance to under-developed countries. The debate in the United Nations Committee seems to indicate very clearly that other possible contributing countries find themselves in the same position, and that serious doubts exist whether the proposals which the majority of the Committee have endorsed would in practice be the best means of promoting economic development in under-developed countries.

[25] Cet aide-mémoire était destiné au Chili, à Cuba, à l'Inde, au Mexique, au Pakistan, au Pérou et à la Yougoslavie.
This aide-mémoire was destined for Chile, Cuba, India, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru and Yugoslavia.

4. "In these circumstances, the Government of Canada believes that the recommendation of the Economic and Financial Committee, requesting the Economic and Social Council to prepare during 1952 a detailed plan for the eventual establishment of a special fund for grants-in-aid and low-interest, long-term loans to under-developed countries, and to lay down specific provisions concerning the size, composition and administration of the fund, is unrealistic and unwise. Such action would raise false hopes and cause misunderstandings among the peoples of advanced and under-developed countries alike. The Canadian Government believes that such misunderstandings can go far to undo much of the good that has been done by agreed and constructive programmes in the past, and may jeopardize the possibility of agreement and constructive action in the future.

5. "The Government of Canada trusts that the Government of (x) recognizes the validity of the reasons for its attitude. It has given the most careful consideration to the resolution recommended by the Economic and Financial Committee but finds itself unable to modify its position. The Canadian Delegation is therefore being instructed to vote against the resolution when it comes before the plenary meeting of the Assembly."

FINANCING OF ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT OF UNDER-DEVELOPED COUNTRIES[26]

In accordance with your request, I have reviewed the question of whether we should ask our Heads of Mission in certain under-developed countries to give to the local Governments an explanation of why Canada cannot support the resolution now before the United Nations for financing the economic development of under-developed countries.

2. The United States is bringing pressure to bear on Governments which have supported this resolution to persuade them to withdraw this support. They are doing this through their Missions in the capitals concerned. The suggestion was made that we should assist the United States by likewise bringing pressure to bear through our Missions.[27] The feeling in the Department was that this would be unwise and that the farthest we should go would be to explain to these Governments why Canada could not support the resolution.

3. If the Governments of these under-developed countries refuse to give way to United States pressure, this will show that they attach very considerable importance to the resolution now before the Assembly and that they would consider it courteous on our part to inform them in advance of why we cannot support the resolution.

4. Consequently I suggest that we send a telegram to our Missions in India, Pakistan, Mexico, Yugoslavia, Chile, Cuba and Peru, reading somewhat as follows:

> Financing of Economic Development. We have been informed by our Delegation to the General Assembly in Paris that the United States Ambassador may have been instructed to try to persuade the Government to withdraw its support for the resolution on the financing of economic development adopted on December 13 by the Economic Committee of the General Assembly and which will shortly come before a plenary session of the Assembly. Please consult with your United States colleague. If he has received such instructions and if the Government still intends to support the resolution, you should give the Foreign Minister the aide mémoire contained in my immediately following telegram.[28] This aide mémoire sets forth the reasons why Canada cannot support the resolution.[29]

5. The attached papers also contain an instruction to our Delegation to the Assembly in Paris. The Department of Finance considers that this instruction is not tough enough but it seems to me that their criticism is unjustified.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY — INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AUTHORITY

On January 7 we instructed our Missions in India, Pakistan, Chile, Cuba, Mexico, Peru and Yugoslavia to give the Foreign Offices in those countries an aide mémoire setting forth the reasons why Canada cannot support the resolution adopted on December 13 by the Second Committee of the General Assembly for the establishment of an international development authority. This instruction was to be carried out only if efforts of the United States Ambassadors to persuade the Governments to withdraw their support for the resolution had been unsuccessful. A copy of the aide mémoire is attached for your convenience.

2. We have now been informed that the United States Ambassadors in the countries mentioned above have not been instructed to approach the Governments. Accordingly, the aide mémoire was not presented. Copies of the telegrams† from the Canadian Missions in those countries are attached.

3. In his telegram dated January 9,† the High Commissioner in India asks whether he should proceed independently. I think that it might be desirable to do so in the case of India and Pakistan, in view of their special relation with Canada as members of the Commonwealth and co-participants in the Colombo Plan.

4. I therefore attach for your consideration proposed telegrams† to the High Commissioners in India and Pakistan asking them to explain orally to the Foreign Offices, along the lines of the aide mémoire, the attitude of the Canadian Government in this matter.[30]

5. I should like, however, to bring to your attention the attached telegram (No. 4 of January 10)† from New Delhi. ANALYSIS AND APPRAISAL OF ACTIVITIES AND ATMOSPHERE OF ASSEMBLY

1. The United Nations General Assembly has met this year in a rather sober but not unrealistic mood. Some of the newspapermen, contrasting the atmosphere with the tense but expectant air which pervaded last year's Assembly during the most critical months of the Korean campaign, are inclined to draw cynical comparisons and depressing conclusions of futility: but I am not sure that this is sound.

2. In any case, it is much too early to try to forecast the value of this year's session. Meanwhile it is worth recalling that the mood of the Assembly is in effect a synthesis of the mood of sixty governments, not that of an organization: so that attempts to assess by the feel of an Assembly the real value of the United Nations, rather than the general psychological and political atmosphere of the international community, are apt to be misleading.

3. The most prominent feature of the session to date has, of course, been the offer of the United States, United Kingdom and French delegations to negotiate a disarmament agreement on certain stated principles. This offer has coincided with the Rome meeting of the North Atlantic Council; a point which Vyshinsky has naturally attempted to exploit for propaganda, and also a fact which has tended to make certain western delegates and newspapermen cynical regarding the sincerity of the west in general and of Washington in particular. This cynicism seems to be exaggerated, if not mistaken. In view of the danger of assuming that a conflict is inevitable, there is, I think, real value in the serious effort by the west to formulate and publicise the principles on which it will be prepared to "negotiate from strength", if the Soviet Government should ever wish to call the armaments race off.

4. While there was little expectation even before the disarmament debate began that the Soviet would agree at this stage to serious negotiations, nevertheless the western offer is a sincere one, and the principles involved have been formulated with sufficient care that the United States and other western governments would be prepared to live with the system, should it later be accepted by the Russians.

5. The course of the debate, thus far, has removed any illusions there may have been that the USSR would be prepared to negotiate now. It is, however, not inconceivable that as western rearmament momentum and relative strength increase, the Soviet Government may later seriously examine the possibilities for negotiation: and if that time comes, the western offers put on the record in the present debate may prove of substantive value.

6. In the meantime, the western disarmament initiative has, I think, already proved of real propaganda use, in tending to wrest the peace campaign initiative from the Russians and to reduce the widespread fears in Western Europe and elsewhere that the United States may become so inflexible as to make eventual war almost unavoidable. The echoes, in European socialist parties, to Bevan's criticisms of this summer, have been appreciable: and the present United States initiative should go some distance to counteract the resultant division in western opinion.

7. The tone of the debate, thus far, has re-enforced this propaganda value, most western statements being moderate and reasonably flexible as well as firm: while the Soviet statements have been stale and vituperative. Vyshinsky's original assertion in the Assembly that he stayed up all night laughing at the western disarmament offer, was a bad error — already picked up by poster cartoonists on the streets of Paris. While the Soviet delegation, apparently on instructions from Moscow, have tried to correct this first mistake, they are very much on the defensive in the propaganda battle, and their counter-attacks, on the old lines of 1947 to 1950, tend to fall flat.

8. The disarmament issue has now been referred to a sub-committee of the Big Four. This move was initiated by Pakistan and two other Moslem states, with wide small-nation support, as an appeal to the colossi to reach some compromise among themselves and thus to let the smaller nations live in peace, however, unless the Great Powers should reach agreement, which is most unlikely, the disarmament debate will be resumed in a week's time.

9. The aggressiveness of Arab nationalism has been an interesting feature of the first few weeks of this Assembly. There are a few recent signs, however, that this may become more moderate. A week ago, the Egyptian spokesman on disarmament virtually aligned his government completely with Cominform policy: This week, the Egyptian delegation has been backtracking energetically. It is uncertain how long the new Egyptian moderation will last, but it appears to have been motivated in part by notes of caution from other Arab delegations and in part by a belated recognition that the earlier extremism tended to consolidate the United States and other western support behind the United Kingdom. It is too early to assess what if any effect, on Arab League policy here, the recent coup d'état in Syria will have.

10. Similarly, in the Assembly's Trusteeship Committee, an earlier tendency among some of the Middle-East and Latin American delegations (but significantly not India or other Asian delegations) to intervene critically and excessively in the colonial affairs of the leading Western European nations, has abruptly given way to a sudden, and perhaps temporary, moderation. This change appears to have been precipitated by a French delegation walk-out from the Fourth Committee (when certain delegations insisted on discussing Morocco, which was not on the agenda), and by instructions to the United Kingdom and certain other delegations to withdraw from the committee if certain anti-colonial resolutions were passed. These western instructions leaked, and as a result of this threat the extreme anti-colonial resolutions were withdrawn. It is very fortunate that no general West-European walk-out took place, as it would have created the worst possible impression in the United States and among non-European peoples — it would have been too reminiscent of the Soviet walkout of 1950, which not only won world-wide disapproval, but, as Korea showed, became a notorious flop. Naturally, the Canadian delegation did what it could to discourage a western walk-out on trusteeship questions and to induce some moderation among the critics.

11. One tendency at this session has been the increasing propensity of the United Kingdom, the United States and the French delegations to consult among themselves in an effort to reach full agreement prior to any discussions with other delegations. Through our own efforts we usually manage to keep in the picture better than other delegations which are often not fully briefed until the final stages of Big Three plans: but we are less frequently consulted than in previous years. The Big Three concert on a wide number of issues is more marked than at previous session: and probably results in part from habits contracted among the Standing Group members in NATO. The fact that three important agenda items — disarmament, collective measures and German elections — are of particular interest to these three powers — is, of course, another factor re-enforcing this tendency to Big Three exclusiveness.

12. The efforts by under-developed countries — led by Chile and India — to develop grandiose schemes for international economic assistance to backward regions — are a feature of this as of all recent sessions. In some ways the pressure at present is more extreme than hitherto. India is spear-heading a move to link international financial assistance to disarmament by proposing the creation of an international development fund into which a proportion of the savings from reduced defense expenditures are to be funnelled. These tendencies will take careful watching. Fortunately many of the under-developed countries are cautious about the more extreme demands. Naturally, this caution springs not from lack of appetite but from a more restrained and realistic tactical sense. Our delegation is of course attempting to encourage this realism by emphasizing that further commitments are quite impracticable at the present time.

13. There are a number of important special programmes which depend on voluntary contributions by member states: notably Korean reconstruction, Palestine refugees, and the expanded programme for technical assistance. The total requirements are now about four hundred million dollars for the next financial period. Hitherto many governments have given vigorous voting support to these programmes but have not made any contributions. A serious move has therefore been launched by the United States and United Kingdom delegations with our support to try to correct this, by developing the "negotiating committee" technique first used last year. We hope that this may bring wider and more equitably shared contributions.

14. An interesting situation is developing in the Fifth (Budget) Committee. The United States representative is a Republican Congressman from Ohio, a strong Taft supporter. The officials on the United States delegation are disturbed at his obvious tendency to take his policy guidance not from the State Department but from the feelings of his fellow-Republicans in Congress. He recently returned from a brief visit to the Council of Europe at Strasbourg with his obduracy apparently reenforced by his meetings with other Congressmen there. His present intention is to inform the Assembly that the United States will not pay more than 33 1/3 percent of next year's United Nations budget, whatever its assessed proportion: he considers the figure of 36 percent, recommended by the Contributions Committee too high. Our delegation, in common with most western delegations, and most members of the United States delegation, are determined to continue the present trend of increasing the Soviet assessment and decreasing that of the United States (and consequently that of Canada, in view of the maximum per capita principle which we have managed to get accepted). But there is some concern that a unilateral United States decision to go faster in this direction than the Contributions Committee has recommended or the Assembly will vote, by refusing to pay its full assessment, could create serious confusion and throw the whole question of contributions into the uncertainties of log-rolling with the wealthier countries in a small minority.

15. In minor political fields, some progress has been made. The United Nations Balkan Commission has been wound up after representations from Greece that its task of discouraging border incidents from the Communist states has been successfully accomplished. The last three days in the ad hoc Committee have been devoted to a Yugoslav complaint relating to its Cominform neighbours; this debate, while time-consuming, has probably served to improve morale inside Yugoslavia, which got fifty votes for its resolution with only the Soviet bloc opposing.

16. On issues which divide the Communists from the rest of us, the tone of the Assembly has been reasonably mild, with the exception of Soviet speeches which while vituperative give the impression of having fallen flat. Soviet propaganda seems to be losing its old touch.

17. Thus far at least there has been virtually no interest shown at this Assembly in Far Eastern issues.

Le chef de la délégation à l'Assemblée générale des Nations Unies au secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Chairman, Delegation to United Nations General Assembly, to Secretary of State for External Affairs

TELEGRAM 252 Paris, December 21, 1951

1. The Assembly will adjourn today for Christmas, and will reconvene on January 2nd.

Disarmament Offer

2. The approval in the First Committee, by 44 votes, of the Western disarmament proposals is a useful if not spectacular accomplishment. The disarmament debate did not register much advance in bringing together the attitudes of the Western and Soviet worlds, but at least there was no apparent widening of the gap. The four-power talks in sub-committee produced some clarification of views on both sides, if no agreement on substance; and the Russians have at least agreed to keep on talking (by sitting on the new commission). The increasing Western military strength, coupled with the three-power diplomatic initiative, have effectively prevented a deterioration and have checked the Soviet peace campaign.

3. Moreover the value of the United Nations decision to merge the Atomic Energy and the Conventional Armament's Commission into a new Joint Disarmament Commission should not be under-estimated. Previously the Western world was in a somewhat unrealistic and perhaps vulnerable position, since we were on record in favour of atomic disarmament (providing there were effective control) irrespective of any simultaneous agreement to disarm in conventional fields in which the USSR is predominant. This earlier Western policy had of course been formulated in 1945 and 1948, before the military implications of Soviet post-war policy had been fully recognized. Our political position is now therefore more realistic, and safer.

4. It is impossible to say whether the Russians may later decide to use the new machinery for serious disarmament negotiations. In any case the door is opened.

5. Meanwhile the propaganda value of this Western initiative in the peace campaign is probably substantial.

Propaganda

6. Propaganda is a necessary activity in a cold war; and on the German question, as well as on disarmament, the political committees of the United Nations have at this session proved useful for this purpose. The recent establishment of a United Nations commission to examine on the spot the practicability of free elections in the Soviet and Western zones of Germany should help to drive home to the German people which side it is that blocks their unity. The commission, established this week, will presumably be able to sustain and repeat this propaganda pressure at various times during the coming year.

7. The German Election Commission was established despite statements by representatives of a Communist German People's Republic before the ad hoc committee, which made it clear that they do not intend to give the commission access to their zone. It is probable therefore that the commission will never function in a substantive sense. Similarly, the new Disarmament Commission has been given instructions, based on the Western desire for verification and watertight inspection, which the Soviet union has repeatedly declared that it will not accept. In both the main political items dealt with thus far in this session, therefore, considerable time has been spent in adopting resolutions and setting up machinery which it is expected that Soviet obstruction will prevent from at least any early achievement of their purpose. A similar point can be made about the resolution on Yugoslav-Cominform relations adopted earlier in the session. Another example of the propaganda function achieved by apparently futile resolutions is the resolution from the Trusteeship Committee adopted by plenary on December 7th asking the Security Council to reconsider Italy's application for United Nations membership on the ground that her position as trustee for Somaliland makes this necessary. This is expected to draw a Soviet veto. The Italian Government has considered the exercise worthwhile, though they are not satisfied to have the Western Powers let the matter rest there.

Restiveness and Neutral Compromises

8. Nevertheless the futility, except for propaganda (the importance of which is often under-rated), of most of this session's political items handled to date produces a certain restiveness and a tendency on the part of some Middle East, Latin American and Asian delegations to put forward "compromise" proposals which if adopted would be not only impractical but ideologically confusing. This represents wishful thinking, on the assumption that a clever form of words can in some magical way eliminate vital differences of principle.

9. On occasion the Canadian delegation has helped to head off such neutralist moves — a notable example being the German election issue, where Canada joined with Norway, Denmark, Iceland and the Netherlands in submitting amendments which caused withdrawal of a Latin American resolution considered dangerous by the occupying powers, and contributed to the withdrawal of a Swedish neutralist resolution, making it possible for the Assembly, with backing from an impressive majority of members (45), to meet Adenauer's desire for a United Nations commission.

Great Power Tendencies

10. The new tendency to Big Three exclusiveness on the part of the United States, United Kingdom, and French delegations has continued, and is beginning to irritate several other delegations. Within the Big Three, the French delegation seems to feel and resent a United States—United Kingdom inner partnership, with the French often brought in only near the last minute to co-sponsor a tripartite resolution. The United Kingdom, for its part, is apt to feel a slight similar resentment at United States habits of demanding what seem unnecessarily rapid decisions from its partners: while the United States delegation has often to clear its views with so many interested offices and departments before there is what could be called a United States Government line for discussion with the United Kingdom, that much time is consumed and deadlines are approached.

11. Meanwhile the United States delegation seems more realistically aware of the dangers of encouraging irritation and neutralism from other delegations, by demonstrations of Big Three exclusiveness, than do either of the weaker members of the trio.

United Kingdom Negativism versus United States Positivism

12. There has been a significant difference of approach between the United Kingdom and the United States on many issues, which seems to boil down to a United Kingdom reluctance to use United Nations machinery for controversial issues. This apparent distrust of the United Nations may spring in part from the difficult time the United Kingdom, like other Imperial Powers, has had on colonial questions in the Fourth Committee. Be this as it may, the relatively negative attitude seems to be sublimated into a British view that the United Nations should somehow stand above and outside serious conflicts and clashes in the world. This is of course contrary to United States view. Members of the United Kingdom delegation often suggest that United Nations participation in controversial issues will tend to weaken the United Nations — though the opposite thesis seems to many people equally or more tenable. In any case the United Kingdom usually, though not always, tends to swing around eventually to the United States view by the time public positions are taken.

13. A few of many examples which could be given of this difference between basic United Kingdom and United States initial attitudes are:

(a) The United Kingdom were reluctant to meet the wishes of Adenauer and the United States for a United Nations commission on all-German elections, but eventually swung round and co-sponsored the resolution;

(b) The United Kingdom delegation did not wish representatives of Western and Eastern Germany to be invited to speak in the committee, but here too eventually swung around;

(c) United Kingdom reluctance contrasted with the United States desire to refer, guardedly but pointedly enough, to such vital real facts as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization in the text of the draft resolution on collective measures (United Nations collective security machinery) which is being sponsored jointly by the United States, United Kingdom, France, Canada and certain other countries.

Latin American Restiveness

14. At this session there has been a greater tendency than in previous years for Latin American and other small countries to disregard United States views (e.g., in Security Council elections, in the debate on financing development, and in other fields).

Moslem Unrest

15. A feature of this session has been Middle East criticism of the West. The entire Moslem world (except Turkey, the strongest Moslem nation) is restive. The Egyptian delegation has been extreme. In addition to spear-heading the effort to support Moroccan nationalists against France, the Egyptians in the Political Committee have on many issues taken up pro-Communist positions, and a few days ago introduced a motion for immediate unconditional prohibition of the use of the atomic bomb.

16. The Pakistan position is perhaps even more significant. Zafrullah Khan, Pakistan Foreign Minister, is playing a very active role at this session (in contrast with Sir Benegal Rau of India). He announced recently that he would abstain on all votes on disarmament issues between the Soviet and Western points of view: and more important, he said recently, when Morocco was being discussed in plenary, that though the West talks a lot about liberal values, whenever there are votes on implementing liberal policies the people of Asia note that the Cominform delegates vote with them, and the Western delegations vote against. He expressed his humble gratitude to the Soviet bloc. This tacit warning by Pakistan that the West must not take their support too much for granted has given great concern to the United States delegation. One factor in Zafrullah's mind is of course the unresolved Kashmir dispute. But against the present disturbing background of general restiveness, Moslem politicians tend to vie with each other for leadership in criticising the West: and Pakistan seeks Moslem leadership.

Walk-outs and Western Petulance

17. This session has brought the long-standing difficulty between South Africa and the United Nations close to a head. What seems to be the contradiction between the trend of Dr. Malan's racial policies and at least the spirit of the United Nations Charter, coupled with the difficult question of South-West Africa, has made some friction almost inevitable. The Fourth Committee's decisions to invite representatives of South-West African natives for a hearing, and the subsequent approval of a resolution regretting South Africa's refusal to negotiate on the basis of the United Nations committee's moderate proposals for the league-mandated territory, and appealing for reconsideration, have had the expected but tragic result of hardening South African opinion. The South African delegation is not now attending plenary sessions of the Assembly or the Fourth Committee: and a complete withdrawal from the United Nations is apparently not excluded. From here it is hard to feel that the United Nations majority has been seriously at fault in this difficult situation. It takes two sides for successful compromise. Most responsible delegations here do, I think, genuinely appreciate the difficulty of South Africa's position: But there is little evidence from the attitude of South Africa, which did after all sign the Charter, of moderation or a conciliatory spirit on its side. This naturally makes the position of South Africa's friends in the United Nations singularly difficult.

18. The limited South African walk-out is merely the most extreme of several petulant reactions by important white countries at this session. For example, the motives of the Egyptian delegation in pressing for discussion of the Moroccan situation are undoubtedly open to question. Nevertheless the refusal by the Western countries dictated by the expediency of conciliating France's obduracy to allow the matter even to be put on the agenda, has undoubtedly created a bad impression. The French delegation, which a few weeks earlier had walked out of the Fourth Committee, were seriously considering walking out of the Assembly if it had been put on the agenda: though they did fortunately decide to drop this idea even before the Assembly by a small but unexpected majority [which] refused to consider the item. The United Kingdom had instructions earlier in the session to walk out of the Trusteeship Committee in certain circumstances, which happily did not arise. The Netherlands delegation has told us that not walking out when Indonesia was first discussed some years ago, is now recognized by them to have been a disastrous error.

The Problem of Irresponsibility

19. While consideration will have to be given to finding some effective method of restraining too many irresponsible charges from representatives of backward countries, walking out or threatening to do so may not be the wisest course. It is inevitable that there are some times apparent contradictions between some of the advanced moral principles written into the United Nations Charter, and occasional policies of even the most advanced democratic governments. Some of the less responsible of the Middle East, Latin American, and Asian countries — where these contradictions between moral theory and economic or political fact are most extreme — do not always consider their own vulnerability before playing on the sensitive points of others.

20. It may be that something like a "coming-into-court-with-clean-hands" doctrine — ("people who live in glass houses should not throw stones") — would be a useful development in United Nations traditions. Frank counter charges about social or political conditions in certain backward countries with irresponsible delegations, may eventually have to be threatened by leading Western nations, perhaps in the capitals concerned, as a means of keeping them in check. This course, while unpalatable, might at least not be so incompatible with the prestige and strength of the United Nations as petulant walk-outs from leading representatives of our western civilization. Surely on balance our civilization gains much more than it loses, strategically and morally, from this framework for an orderly world.

The Poor Against the Rich

21. It is not only in supporting nationalist movements of non-white peoples, that the attitudes of certain delegations from backward countries has been giving concern. Aristotle pointed out long ago that once a democratic political constitution is set up, it is made inevitable that sooner or later the poor will use their voting power to secure economic, as well as political benefits. The welfare state developments of recent years illustrate this thesis nationally: the drive in the United Nations for assistance in economic development suggests that even a very loose international constitution is unlikely to prove any exception to the general law. Few Christians or liberals would consider this inevitable tendency wholly bad, even apart from the (significance and advantages?) of such measures as the Technical Assistance Programme and the Colombo Plan. Of course the highly industrialized countries cannot under present circumstances increase expenditures for foreign assistance, and it is important to say so frankly. The question of pace and extent is important, and if the poorer majority try to push too fast or too far, the chief result must be merely to weaken or destroy the constitutional framework. This would help neither side.

22. The problem is to make a majority of the "under-developed" governments see this point or, at least, vote as if they saw it.

23. In the Third Committee debates at this session on the proposed Human Rights Covenant, it has become clear that the backward nations — which are spear-heading the drive to include economic and social rights — consider that once minimum economic and social rights are internationally recognized, it will be difficult for the industrialized nations to refuse contributions to international funds which aim at implementing these rights (e.g. health and schooling opportunities for all).

24. In the Second Committee debates on financing economic development, Santa Cruz of Chile, has now carried a stage further his long campaign for the creation of an international development fund. The intransigence of under-developed countries, in voting for a resolution asking for detailed plans to be made for the establishment of such a fund, despite the clear opposition of the United States, Canada and the West European countries who would be expected to contribute to it, was more apparent than in previous years. The under-developed majority was, however, far from solid, and was based to a considerable extent on personal ambitions and on an uneasy coalition between rival groups. The Indians contributed to Santa Cruz' idea by securing unrealistic approval for this sweeping thesis that money saved in the future when defence budgets can be reduced should be paid into the fund.

25. The battle to defeat this wildly ambitious project is far from lost. If, however, the fund is established next year, the probable effect would merely be to debase the currency of United Nations resolutions and machinery. Nevertheless, the intransigence and what would seem to the delegations of richer countries the irresponsibility of the majority have tended to create a certain cynicism.

26. It is however not certain that the United Kingdom and France are at heart strongly opposed to this project — which, presumably in the unlikely event that the United States Congress implemented it even slightly, would contribute to solving their dollar-gap problem.

27. The tactics of the United States delegation, in this debate on development, have not shown up to best advantage, and their last ditch-stand against the fund came unfortunately late. The most direct opposition was probably that of Canada, Australia and Belgium. Naturally, the Soviet delegation did not pass up the opportunity to play in the muddied waters of Committee Two on this issue, but their amused toleration of the discussion suggests that even they are making less effort than previously to cover-up their own cynicism.

The International Civil Service

28. There have been certain signs of politicking and empire building in certain sections of the United Nations Secretariat. Some of this is probably inevitable in an international civil service of this sort. It would be misleading and unfair to stress this criticism strongly although unquestionably, stronger leadership at the top could effect an improvement.

Conclusion

29. We are conscious that this telegram has been, in many ways, rather critical. It is but appropriate in conclusion to point out that irresponsibility, intransigence, petulance, and other disturbing features are weaknesses not of the United Nations as such but of the governments and societies of the planet on which we live.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures pour le sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], December 28, 1951

I read the attached telegram No. 252 of December 21 from our Delegation at the United Nations Assembly with a great deal of interest. There are two main points on which I would like to comment, one related to the alleged progress made on the propaganda front and the second on the "holier than thou" attitude which our Delegation seems to be developing.

2. I was rather puzzled by the general implication that the West had made some progress on the propaganda front during the present Assembly, as a result of the Western disarmament proposals, the merging of the Atomic Energy and the Conventional Armaments Commission, and the establishment of the German Election Commission. There seems to be a general feeling that a propaganda move satisfactory to Western Europe and North America is welcome in all parts of the world. It seems to me that a distinction has to be kept in mind whereby, on the multiple propaganda front, different publics or regions can vary differently. Public opinion in Western countries has to be marshalled by some sort of propaganda if the goals now set for the purposes of consolidating our defence efforts are to be attained, but I must say that we would have made little progress generally if, in the process, we would have lost the propaganda battle in all other regions of the world. Personally, I feel that there is a direct link between the alleged progress made on the propaganda front as expressed in paras. 6 and 7 of the telegrams under reference and the restiveness and neutral compromises referred to in paras. 8 and 9. These last two paragraphs could very well be taken as an indication that the propaganda battle is not going so well after all and that we can no longer think that we have made progress in the war of nerves if we have only convinced our own peoples of the necessity of taking this or that action.[32]

3. To my mind, the United Nations is far from being an ideal forum for too obvious propaganda maneuverings by the West: the Communist Governments, particularly that of the U.S.S.R., are always in a position to prevent the Western themes of propaganda from reaching their own peoples. The net result is that we are only preaching to converts and neutrals. If we lose the neutrals, we will have lost the battle. One of the most significant developments of the present Assembly, in my estimation, is the position taken by Pakistan as referred to in para. 16. Zafrullah Khan has probably touched one of the most complex and vital issues with which the United Nations will have to live for years to come. The West is in a quandary: if it does not champion liberal policies it will, slowly but surely, lose the support of many countries; if it does, a certain amount of chaos will ensue. There are great dangers in both courses of action but the second course in my estimation is less dangerous in the long run than the first.[33]

4. This does not seem to be the opinion of our Delegation in Paris and I was somewhat surprised to see the line adopted in paras. 19 and 20, dealing with "the problem of irresponsibility". I am not particularly attracted by the theme "come-into-court-with-clean-hands". It is relatively easy to have clean hands when you can afford to buy some soap. Would it be that only those countries enjoying a higher standard of living would have clean hands? I doubt that any problems can be solved among nations if we subscribe to such a doctrine. I am sure, on the other hand, that there will be a lot of mud-slinging if we adopt it.[34]

5. There is a problem of irresponsibility at the United Nations and I would agree that it comes mostly from countries of the Middle East, Latin America and Asia. To try to solve it by "counter charges about social or political conditions in certain backward countries with irresponsible delegations" is the worst possible approach.

6. What seems to be required here is that closer cooperation with under-developed countries be established, and that they be given some guidance and an assurance that, once we will be sure of our own defence against the Communist menace, we will gladly participate in the solving of their economic ills.[35]

ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

SECTION A

DOUZIÈME SESSION, LE 20 FÉVRIER-21 MARS 1951
TWELFTH SESSION, FEBRUARY 20-MARCH 21, 1951

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 45-51 Ottawa, February 10, 1951

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE TWELFTH SESSION OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL, SANTIAGO, CHILE, FEBRUARY 20 TO MARCH 20, 1951[36]

General

The agenda for the Twelfth Session of ECOSOC is relatively light and should be easily completed within the four weeks period estimated by the Secretary-General. There may be a tendency on the part of the Latin American members to prolong a meeting being held in their own territory, and the Cominform delegations will undoubtedly contribute to this end by using the Council as a propaganda forum. The Delegation should resist attempts to draw out the session longer than is genuinely necessary to deal with its agenda thoroughly and efficiently.

2. The three Cominform members of the Council, the Soviet Union, Poland and Czechoslovakia, can be expected to make the most of their opportunities for propaganda at the Santiago Session. The fact that Chile has broken diplomatic relations with these Governments may be an additional incentive for them to use the Council as a medium of propaganda in that area. It is to be hoped that the non-Communist members of the Council will refuse to be drawn into lengthy and futile propaganda debates, and the Delegation should do what it can towards this end.

3. The Council will review the progress made in setting up the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency. Canada has endorsed the United Nations programme of relief and rehabilitation in Korea both in the Council and in the General Assembly, and the Government has pledged financial support of the programme

[36] Le chef de la délégation était John Kearney, ambassadeur en Argentine.
The Canadian delegation was led by John Kearney, Ambassador in Argentina.

(Cabinet decision of November 23, 1950). The Delegation should support United Nations action in helping the Korean people to repair the ravages of war in their country.

4. The Delegation should continue to maintain a close scrutiny of all proposals, and to assess the various plans submitted with a view to ensuring that the limited resources of funds and facilities are put to the best purpose.

Economic Questions

5. The principal economic items are those relating to technical assistance and economic development of under-developed countries. The general Canadian position on these questions has been clearly defined at previous sessions of the Council and of the General Assembly, and the Delegation should continue to be guided by the instructions approved for earlier sessions. Canadian support of the principles and objectives of the Technical Assistance Programme could be stressed, and the Delegation should continue to press for effective co-ordination and careful selection of projects of practical value.

6. The under-developed countries will undoubtedly exert heavy pressure on the Council to approve measures designed to stimulate the flow of investment capital for economic development and the location of the Session in Latin America, with the consequent increase in local press publicity, will probably encourage these delegations to press their claims with added vigour. The desire of the less advanced countries to improve their economic conditions and the standard of living of their people is valid, and the Delegation should be most careful to avoid giving any impression that Canada is unsympathetic to legitimate aspirations. However, as Canadian delegations have stressed in the past, before the governments of under-developed countries can expect substantial increase of investment from abroad many of them will have to try to create a political, economic and social atmosphere that is friendly rather than hostile to such investment and to the measure of outside concern in their affairs that necessarily goes with it. Moreover, the Economic and Social Council itself is not, nor is it likely to become, a suitable channel for arranging or facilitating inter-governmental financing. The International Bank can and does provide loans to under-developed countries where the chances of repayment are reasonably good; in the sphere of other capital assistance, such as grants, most countries in a position to provide it will prefer to do so under bilateral arrangements rather than through a U.N. agency. This is the present position of the Canadian Government; it is also the position of other governments as indicated by the Marshall Plan and the Colombo Plan.

Social Questions

7. The most difficult item on the agenda in the social field is that concerning forced labour, and measures for its abolition. A joint U.S.-U.K. resolution calling for the establishment of a U.N.-I.L.O. commission of inquiry was tabled at the Eleventh Session and will come before the Council at the Twelfth Session for a decision. The proposed inquiry is intended to serve propaganda purposes by collecting evidence on forced labour in the Soviet Union and other Cominform countries. As such an inquiry could not benefit the victims of forced labour, and as the propaganda value of the undertaking is doubtful, it would be preferable if some alternative course of action could be agreed upon which would meet the U.S. and U.K. position without involving the U.N. in a risky propaganda venture. If a satisfactory compromise is impossible and the U.S.-U.K. proposal stands, the Delegation should support it. In that event, all necessary facilities should be provided to the Commission to ensure a first-class inquiry.[37]

TWELFTH SESSION OF ECOSOC

I attach for your information a copy of a memorandum containing a general survey of the Twelfth Session of ECOSOC. I drafted this memorandum shortly after my return from Santiago but did not circulate it before this as I wanted to have Mr. Parkinson approve the economic sections or revise them if he saw fit. Mr. Parkinson has now informed me that he saw no reason to make any alterations in the text and that he approved the entire memorandum. This general survey will form the introduction to the delegation's report, a copy of which will be sent to you when available. In the meantime I thought you might be interested in reading this general account of the atmosphere and trends apparent at the Twelfth Session of the Council.

CONFIDENTIAL [n.d.]

GENERAL SURVEY OF THE TWELFTH SESSION OF ECOSOC

The outstanding feature of the Twelfth Session of the Council was the all-out propaganda campaign waged by the Communist Delegations who used every opportunity, and indeed created opportunities, to divert discussion from the practical, and for the most part, routine items on the agenda to political and highly contentious debate. There is no doubt that the locale of the Session in Chile incited the Soviet bloc to go to even greater lengths than usual, not only to sell their own ideas, [37] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 13 février 1951./Approved by Cabinet, February 13, 1951.

but to discredit the United States in Latin America. It was clear from the outset that the objective of their offensive was to be the United States, and from the beginning to the end of the Session they were never distracted from their target. A few passing references were made to United Kingdom policy and the capitalist system was, of course, condemned in every major statement, but the villain in the piece was the United States Government which had made dupes of us all for its own sinister ends, specifically economic domination, political hegemony and World War III.

2. For the first half of the Session the United States Delegation was seriously worried over the possible effects of the Communist propaganda drive and, because the United States was just as anxious to protect its position in Latin America as the Soviet bloc was to undermine it, the United States Delegation felt obliged to take up the challenge by defending themselves against these Communist charges of imperialism, war mongering and economic domination and by making counter charges against the Soviet bloc and the Communist system. As a result, much of the Session was devoted to heated political debate between the main protagonists, while the majority of the Council members were reduced to the role of spectators.

3. The Communist Delegations, led by Katz-Suchy of Poland, relied heavily on outrageous distortion of facts, generalizations based on individual expressions of opinion drawn from an inexhaustible supply of press clippings, and fragmentary quotations out of context, to support their charges against the United States, and on interminable and repetitious speeches, often completely irrelevant to the agenda item under discussion, to prove by contrast the ideal living condition prevailing in Eastern Europe under peace-loving governments whose only concern was the welfare of their own people. The Communist propaganda attacks on the United States and on capitalist countries in general were so extreme and their tactics so obvious that the only effect on the Council itself was to bring about a united front of opposition and to drive below the surface the honest differences of opinion which in a more normal atmosphere, such as prevailed at the Eleventh Session, would have been freely discussed and probably reconciled. The effect upon the Chilean public was more difficult to estimate. Tremendous publicity was given the Council Session by the local press and scattered comments made to the Delegation seemed to indicate that among the more intelligent and thoughtful people the cause of Communism and the prestige of the United Nations had both suffered. The United States Delegation was convinced that before the end of the Session the Communist delegations by their heavy-handed methods had done more harm to their own cause than to the United States position in Latin America. This is probably true, although certain correspondents, including Frei of the Christian Science Monitor, considered that the honours were about even in a situation in which almost all the advantages lay with the Western democracies. Apart from the effect which the Communist offensive may have had on the United States reputation in Latin America, there is little doubt that the United Nations itself suffered a loss of prestige by the spectacle, or as the local newspapers occasionally described it, the "circus", put on by the Council. The same routine was followed with almost every subject, with one or other of the Communist Delegations taking the offensive, resorting to all their usual irritating tricks, goading the United States and even the United Kingdom representative into replies, and in the end reducing the discussion to an undignified verbal brawl. The local Chileans who were interested enough and knowledgeable enough to attend the Sessions or read the press accounts intelligently were considerably disillusioned and felt that not only were the proceedings below the dignity of an organization such as the United Nations, but that little if anything of practical value was accomplished in the four weeks. This latter criticism is not altogether valid, because the agenda of the Twelfth Session was composed for the most part of fairly routine items or progress reports and it was not expected that the Session would produce much in the way of positive action. It was, however, a natural reaction on the part of the local Chileans to weigh the results against the four weeks' violent and aggressive debating.

4. On the more important economic issues the under-developed countries seized every opportunity to put forward their claims for economic assistance in developing their resources. They were clearly worried over the possible detrimental effects on their own economy of the accelerated defence programmes of the more advanced countries. This was particularly noticeable when the Council discussed the world economic situation and the question of financing of economic development.

5. However, while the delegations of the under-developed countries took advantage of the general debates to make long statements explaining their position and their requirements and urging that effective measures be applied to protect their interests, they showed a willingness to compromise on final resolutions and refrained from publicly placing industrialized countries in a difficult situation. There were several contributing causes to this comparatively reasonable attitude including, as mentioned above, a disinclination to play into the hands of the Soviet bloc by showing an open split in the ranks of the non-Communist countries. Other factors were the moderating influence of Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar, the sympathetic understanding shown by the delegations of the United States and other industrialized countries of the real problems of the under-developed areas and the realization by the representatives of these countries that in the present international political climate it was not the part of wisdom to press their claims with too much vigour. None of these considerations prevented the Latin American and Asian Delegations from tabling extreme draft resolutions and exerting heavy pressure in private discussions, but after considerable behind-the-scenes negotiating, divergent views were reconciled and the final resolutions on the two major economic items, namely, the world economic situation and the financing of economic development, represented a reasonable compromise which was generally acceptable.

6. The resolution on the financing of economic development does little more than again postpone the issue, but it may be that this is the last occasion when it will be possible to satisfy the under-developed countries without some positive action. It appeared that the particular insistence at this Session for new machinery to expand the financing of economic development was in large part due to the various reports reaching Santiago from the United States regarding the recommendations of the United States Advisory Board on International Development. From the point of view of the potential capital exporting countries on the Council, the Rockefeller Report was made public at an inopportune time and the tremendous publicity given to the Report in the Chilean press did not ease the situation.

7. The Twelfth Session of the Council was the first occasion when the U.N. organ had met outside of New York or Geneva. Fears had been expressed in some quarters that the holding of the Session in Santiago would create technical difficulties for the Secretariat which would prevent them from operating efficiently. It must be stated in all fairness that the Chilean authorities co-operated splendidly and there were no complaints about the working arrangements. The meetings were held in the Carrera Hotel and the rooms assigned for the plenary and committee meetings were quite adequate. The documentation was carried out smoothly, the interpretation facilities, which were installed by U.N. technical personnel, operated perfectly and no inconvenience was experienced by delegations or Secretariat. All delegations except the United Kingdom Delegation and most of the Secretariat lived in the same hotel where the meetings were held. Members of the Santiago Police Force (Carabineros) were stationed on every floor of the hotel as well as outside the building. Special car parking facilities were provided and the surrounding streets were declared to be a silence zone for the duration of the session.

8. The disadvantages of holding the Session in Santiago were due not to any carelessness or lack of co-operation on the part of the Chilean authorities, but were attributable to the distances which delegations had to travel and the transportation expenses involved and, as a result of these two factors, the small size of most delegations. There was also, for many delegations, the difficulty of communication with their home governments. Many basic documents were distributed after the Session opened in Santiago and delegations who required instructions on the basis of these documents found it necessary either to airmail them home or send long telegrams explaining the problem. Apart from the practical disadvantages, the Council itself suffered by the attempts of the Communist Delegations to use the Session as a forum for propaganda in Latin America.

9. Partly because of the nature of the agenda, and partly because several delegations were too few in number to cover more than two meetings operating simultaneously, most of the items were dealt with entirely in plenary. The Economic Committee was fairly busy, but the Social Committee held very few meetings and those on minor items. No meetings of the Coordination Committee took place and the items on coordination were dealt with in the plenary.

10. The level of representation of most delegations at the Twelfth Session was below the usual standard. The United States Delegation was led by its Permanent Representative and Deputy Representative and, although less numerous than usual, was considerably larger than necessary. The United Kingdom Delegation was nominally headed by their resident Ambassador who gave two or three prepared statements but otherwise took no part in the discussions. The full-time working members of the United Kingdom Delegation consisted of three officers from the Permanent Delegation in New York who were assisted part-time by two members of the staff of the local Embassy. The leader of the Soviet bloc was Katz-Suchy of Poland who was indeed the only strong member of the team. The leader of the U.S.S.R. Delegation, Cherneshev, was just average and all the other members of his Delegation were definitely below average both in intelligence and effectiveness. The Czechoslovak Delegation consisted of Nosek of their Permanent Delegation in New York, and the Czech Ambassadors to Buenos Aires and Mexico. The only one of these three who entered with any zest into the propaganda debates was the Ambassador to Mexico. With the exception of this No. 3 Czech and Katz-Suchy, all members of the three Communist Delegations, while adhering strictly to the party line and contributing to the propaganda attacks and usual delaying tactics, nevertheless conducted themselves in a reasonably courteous and civilized manner. The three newly-elected Members, Uruguay, Sweden and the Philippines, were represented by Delegations which contributed very little to the work of the Session. Sweden took almost no part in the debates and Uruguay did little more. The Philippines, on the other hand, participated far more than they should have with the particular Delegation in attendance. Their interventions were for the most part useless and irritating. The Canadian Delegation compared favourably with most of the Delegations in the calibre of its members, but with only four officers, experienced some difficulty in covering the meetings, carrying on private discussions and negotiations, keeping up with the flood of documentation and preparing reports.

11. The agenda for the Twelfth Session consisted mainly either of routine items or items dealing with problems of a continuing nature, and it was not to be expected that very much in the way of positive achievements would result from this Session. The most important positive action was probably the establishment of a joint UN-ILO Commission of Enquiry which, it is hoped, will determine the nature and extent of large-scale forced labour systems in the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries. While the Commission is not to be restricted in its survey to any particular geographical area, the evidence so far brought before the Council indicates that it is only behind the Iron Curtain that forced labour camps, sponsored by governments, and forming an important element in the economy of the countries concerned, are in fact in operation.

12. The principal achievements on the economic aide were the two resolutions arising out of the items on the world economic situation and the financing of economic development. The first of these recommends to member governments that they take certain measures aimed at counteracting the difficulties being encountered by under-developed countries with regard to shortages of needed imports, lower levels of investment, scarcity of capital goods, and new inflationary pressures resulting from the present international situation. The second resolution makes no specific recommendations, but as a concession to under-developed countries recognizes their insistence that special emphasis be given to the problem of financing of economic development and, to this end, provides for the Economic Committee of the Council to meet a week in advance of the opening of the Thirteenth Session and requests the Economic, Employment and Development Commission to give priority at its forthcoming session to the consideration of this problem.

13. Before leaving Santiago, the Council decided, in the light of the deferment until November of the Sixth Session of the General Assembly, to postpone its next session in Geneva until approximately August 1. The tentative agenda for the Thirteenth Session already numbers over fifty items and the Secretary-General estimates that 7 to 8 weeks will be needed to complete the business of the summer session.

DRAFT COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS: CANADIAN STATEMENT TO THE UNITED NATIONS

A report by an interdepartmental committee which has been examining the Canadian attitude to the draft covenant on human rights being drawn up by the United Nations is submitted herewith. It considers the Canadian position on this project and has attached to it a draft statement which, if approved, will be sent to the Secretary-General of the United Nations. The observations of member governments of the United Nations on the draft covenant have been requested.

It is recommended that Cabinet approve the transmission to the United Nations of the statement, the nature of which is summarized in paragraphs 12 to 15 of the committee's report.

Rapport du Comité interministériel sur le Pacte provisoire sur les droits de l'homme

Report of Interdepartmental Committee on Draft Covenant on Human Rights

RESTRICTED [Ottawa], February 12, 1951

CANADIAN STATEMENT TO THE UNITED NATIONS

The recent session of the General Assembly of the United Nations passed a resolution requesting governments to submit their observations on the draft covenant on human rights by February 15, 1951. The views of governments will be considered by the Commission on Human Rights in revising the draft covenant. When speaking in the Social Committee of the General Assembly on October 19, 1950, the Canadian representative said that Canada would welcome the opportunity which would be given to governments at a later date of submitting in writing their views on the draft covenant. The attached statement, which would be sent to the Secretary-General of the United Nations, if approved, has been drafted for this purpose.

2. On September 12, 1950, Cabinet considered instructions to the Canadian delegation to the General Assembly on the draft covenant and agreed that the Canadian delegation state that the present text was not satisfactory and would require substantial revision before Canada would be in a position to vote for its adoption. This attitude was expressed by our representatives.

3. As a party to the Charter of the United Nations, Canada contracted certain general obligations to promote and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. Each State signatory to the Charter has accepted the obligations on human rights which are set forth in the preamble, Articles 1 (3), 13, 55, 56, 62 and 68. The extent of the obligations has never been determined in exact terms. The nature of the commitments made under the Charter is described as follows by Professor Lauterpacht:

"The question of the observance of fundamental human rights has, as the result of the Charter, ceased to be one of exclusive domestic jurisdiction of States and, though not involving a right of direct intervention on the part of the United Nations, has become a matter of legitimate concern to its members and to the Organisation as a whole. Though imperfect from the point of view of enforcement, the relevant provisions of the Charter constitute legal obligations of the members of the United Nations and of the Organisation as a whole. The fundamental human rights and freedoms acknowledged by the Charter must henceforth be regarded as legal rights recognised by International Law. Their enforcement, subject to the limitations of the Charter, must be regarded as a paramount object of the United Nations".

4. When speaking in the Political Committee of the Assembly on November 25, 1946, when the question of the treatment of Indians in South Africa was under discussion, Mr. St. Laurent, as Secretary of State for External Affairs, said:

"It is worthy of note also that Article 1 of the Charter states in clear terms that it is a purpose of the United Nations to promote international co-operation in 'promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion'. This is an unqualified obligation which rests upon each Member of the United Nations. The Canadian delegation, in common with all other delegations, regards the promotion of international action in the field of human rights and freedoms as of the utmost importance in the establishment and maintenance of a just and lasting peace."

Mr. St. Laurent in a speech in Montreal on February 24, 1947, said:

"Each Member of the United Nations has, by signing the Charter which contains these declarations on human rights contracted by treaty a solemn obligation to promote and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction of race, sex, language or religion. Each national government has, in the name of its people, accepted this obligation knowing the difficulties likely to be encountered in honouring it to the full. The Members of the United Nations have pledged themselves to act together in overcoming these difficulties; they have likewise pledged themselves to act separately. Thus failure by one nation to act provides no excuse for the inaction of others."

Canada voted in favour of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, a statement of principles, which was adopted by the General Assembly in Paris in December, 1948, though the Canadian vote was accompanied by an explanation reserving the rights of the provinces under the Canadian constitution. In a speech in the Social Committee of the General Assembly on October 19, 1950, when the draft covenant was under discussion, the Canadian representative said:

"The objective of the covenant — the assurance of effective enjoyment of basic fundamental rights and freedoms — is one with which my delegation is wholly in accord."

5. The draft covenant has been in the course of preparation for several years. It has been conceived of as part of an international bill of rights, to consist of a statement of principles or a common standard of achievement for all countries, which has already taken the form of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and of a multilateral convention giving rise to legal rights and obligations in the field of human rights. The Commission on Human Rights was given the task of drafting a suitable international treaty. Sooner or later the General Assembly will be asked to vote on this covenant which, if approved, will then be opened for signature and ratification. A decision by Canada to vote against the covenant would likely result in putting ourselves in this matter in a camp consisting largely of the Soviet Union and its satellites. In any event, it would expose Canada to propaganda attacks designed to show how lightly we regard our Charter commitments and what little importance we attach to the promotion of respect for human rights when we are faced with an opportunity to indicate our good intentions in a concrete form.

6. The strength of the movement in favour of international treaties to protect human rights is shown by the fact that fifteen members of the Council of Europe have recently signed a Convention on human rights and fundamental freedoms. Greece and Sweden have already ratified it and the United Kingdom expects to ratify before the end of this month.

7. As the project of a United Nations covenant is now well under way and is likely to be brought to a conclusion, it is considered that it would be wise for Canada to endeavour to influence its form and content so as to make it as unobjectionable as possible to Canada. Any international treaty drawn up under the auspices of the United Nations will inevitably, however, be the result of compromises between the varying legal systems, civilizations and policies of the participating countries. It is, therefore, too much to hope to obtain an instrument which is entirely satisfactory to Canada or any other signatory.

8. The measures of implementation and enforcement under the covenant provide for the creation of a Human Rights Committee of seven members who will be nominated and elected by the states parties to the covenant. The draft provides that they shall be persons of high standing and of recognized experience in the field of human rights and that in their election consideration shall be given to equitable geographical distribution. In the attached statement it is suggested that they should also, like the judges of the International Court of Justice, be representative of the main forms of civilization and of the principal legal systems of the states parties to the covenant.

9. It is conceivable that accession to the Covenant on Human Rights might, at some future date, mean that action contemplated or taken by the Canadian Parliament would be in conflict with our international obligations. Our accession to an international convention would not, however, render any national legislation ultra vires or prevent Parliament from passing legislation at some future date which might be in conflict with our international obligations. These obligations do not, moreover, go further than the principles we recognize in ordinary practice and do not depart from except in emergencies. To cover such cases there are emergency provisions in the proposed covenant. Our freedom of action in the national sphere thus would not be interfered with from a strictly legal point of view, though in fact treaty obligations of this nature, as of many other kinds, may place limitations on internal policies.

10. Our adherence to the covenant might result in increased public pressure for a domestic Bill of Rights, though this is not certain, but the covenant provides an answer to such a demand as it gives the government an opportunity to explain that it has assumed these obligations to protect human rights in an international treaty as a matter of public policy and that this is not inconsistent with its policy in respect to domestic legislation for promoting the observance of human rights. It could be added that while the government relies on the traditional legal methods of protecting human rights in Canada, it considers that the covenant will be helpful internationally in promoting respect for these rights and in psychological warfare against the Soviet world.

11. Considerable public interest has been shown in this project for a multilateral convention on human rights and it is likely that questions may be asked in Parliament on the Canadian Government's attitude towards it. The attached statement has, therefore, been drafted not only to meet the United Nations request, but also to be of use in Parliament should it be required for this purpose.

12. At the outset the statement indicates the constitutional and legal difficulties raised by the draft covenant. On the first eighteen articles of the draft covenant which define the human rights and freedoms with which it is concerned, the view is expressed that the scope or content of the draft text is generally satisfactory, though one or two secondary provisions might be deleted, but that the form or quality of drafting requires substantial revision. A number of examples is given of the drafting changes that appear to be called for.

13. On the proposal to include a federal state clause in the covenant, under which the legal obligations would, in the case of federal states, be limited to those matters coming within federal jurisdiction, it is stated that, in the absence of a satisfactory federal clause, Canada could not become a party to the covenant. The text for a federal clause suggested by India appears satisfactory. The statement also supports the inclusion of a colonial application clause under which a state with dependent territories would be able to adhere to the covenant without automatically and immediately binding these territories.

14. The statement presents some of the arguments against the inclusion of clauses on economic, social and cultural rights in the first covenant.

15. On the measures for implementing or enforcing the covenant, it is contended that it would be wise to limit to states parties to the covenant the right of laying complaints against other states parties to it and that the covenant should not provide for the receipt and examination of petitions from individuals and non-governmental organizations.

16. It is recommended that approval be sought for the transmission to the United Nations of the statement attached.

Déclaration canadienne sur le Pacte provisoire sur les droits de l'homme

Canadian Statement on Draft Covenant on Human Rights

February [n.d.], 1951

Under the Canadian constitutional and legal system, human rights and freedoms have been protected by judgments of the courts and by specific statutes rather than by general declarations, statements of principles or a bill of rights. Indeed, it would appear that residents of Canada enjoy in fact all the rights set forth in the draft covenant on human rights, apart from the provision for compensation in the event of a miscarriage of justice, dealt with in Article 10 (3). In Canada these rights have been observed and enforced on a rather different basis than in some other countries.

2. The existence of different methods and procedures for defining and protecting human rights has inevitably given rise to some divergence of views on the draft covenant, as expressed by the representatives of various countries in the General Assembly and other organs of the United Nations. It must thus be recognized that there are many difficulties and obstacles to be overcome in reaching a general understanding on an international treaty or agreement dealing with human rights.

3. No useful purpose would be served in bringing before the General Assembly of the United Nations for adoption a revised text of the draft covenant unless it is framed in a way to meet with wide and speedy acceptance by a large and representative group of the nations of the free world. This requires that full recognition be given to the constitutional difficulties of federal states and states with dependent territories. Canada, for its part, could not become a party to the covenant in the absence of a satisfactory federal clause. Furthermore, it is considered that the proposed attempt to include economic and social rights will jeopardize the completion and coming into force of the covenant.

The First Eighteen Articles of the Draft Covenant

4. The content or scope of the first eighteen articles of the present draft text of the covenant appears to be generally satisfactory, in the sense that they cover the essential or fundamental civil rights. It would not appear to be wise to attempt to add at this stage to the basic principles embodied in these articles, as any endeavour to do this might well result in lengthy delays in establishing the text of the covenant and limit substantially the number of states prepared to ratify it.

5. Indeed, it might be advisable to consider the deletion of certain rather more secondary provisions in the first eighteen articles, such as the provision in paragraph 2, sub-section (b) of Article 10 to grant free legal aid, and the provisions in paragraph 6 of Article 6 and paragraph 3 of Article 10, to accord compensation in the case of unlawful arrest or a miscarriage of justice in the courts. Other countries interested in the formulation of the covenant have pointed out that these provisions have extensive administrative and financial implications. It might therefore be advisable not to include them at the present stage.

6. As regards the form or quality of drafting the first eighteen articles, the present draft text requires substantial revision. The articles are very unevenly formed. Some contain very detailed provisions while others are expressed in terms of general principles. The criticisms made of the text by different governments have been of a conflicting nature, as some have wished to have more detailed provisions with lengthy enumerations of exceptions to, or limitations on, the basic rights as defined in the covenant, while other governments have expressed a desire to confine the text to general provisions without spelling out restrictions and exceptions in detail. Since it is necessary for the purpose of a general international convention to find some common ground between the various legal systems in existence in the free world, technical terms and detailed provisions should be eliminated as far as possible, and the definitions of rights in the covenant should be expressed in general terms, while at the same time avoiding ambiguity or vagueness as far as possible.

7. In an annex to this statement some comments are made on a few articles to illustrate the unsatisfactory form of the first eighteen articles.

Federal State Clause

8. The comprehensive resolution of the General Assembly of December 4, 1950, concerning the future work of the Commission on Human Rights contains a reference to the federal state clause and provides that the Commission shall make recommendations for the purpose of securing the maximum extension of the covenant to the constituent units of federal states, and meeting the constitutional problems of federal states. The inclusion of a federal clause recognizing the special position of federal states in the covenant is of the greatest importance to Canada. Indeed, in the absence of a satisfactory federal clause, Canada, because of the nature of its constitution, which distributes legislative powers over the field of human rights between the national parliament and the provincial legislatures, could not become a party to the covenant.

9. Several proposals and texts have been advanced to meet the constitutional difficulties of federal states. Of these the text proposed by India at the Fifth Session of the Commission on Human Rights appears to be the most satisfactory.

"(a) In respect of any articles of the Covenant, the implementation of which is, under the constitution of the federation, wholly or in part within federal jurisdiction, the obligations of the Federal Government shall, to that extent, be the same as those of parties which are not federal states.

(b) In respect of any articles of this Covenant, the implementation of which is under the constitution of the federation, wholly or in part within the jurisdiction of the constituent units (whether described as states, provinces, cantons, autonomous regions, or by any other name), the Federal Government shall bring such provisions with favourable recommendations to the notice of the appropriate authorities of the units."

Colonial Application Clause

10. On December 4, the General Assembly also adopted a separate resolution concerned with the application of the covenant to dependent territories. This not only records a decision against the inclusion of a colonial application clause in the covenant, but presents the text for an article which would require that the provisions of the covenant apply automatically and immediately to all dependent territories of metropolitan states which become parties to the covenant. Many delegations voted in favour of this resolution in the belief that the benefits and rights under the covenant should not be withheld from colonial peoples. The majority decision is, however, regrettable since, if it is maintained, it will undoubtedly make it very difficult, if not impossible for a number of states with non-self-governing territories to become parties to the covenant, even after lengthy delays.

11. Under a colonial application clause, such as Article 12 of the Genocide Convention, the provisions of the covenant would not be automatically binding on overseas territories at the time of ratification, but the state responsible for the international relations of the territories in question would be able at any time by notification to extend the application of the covenant to any or all of these territories. In a social and humanitarian convention of the character of the draft covenant, which concerns many matters of local legislative jurisdiction, a clause should be included to facilitate the adherence of states with dependencies, as these states frequently have constitutional difficulties in applying conventions to their territories and as they attach great importance to respecting the autonomy and measure of self-government enjoyed by colonial governments and legislatures.

Self-determination of Peoples and Nations

12. The principal resolution adopted by the Assembly on December 4 contains a part whereby the Commission is to be requested to study ways and means which would ensure the right of peoples and nations to self-determination, though the resolution does not specifically state that articles for this purpose are to be included in the draft covenant. The principle of self-determination, which is recognized in the Charter of the United Nations itself, is of the greatest importance. The right of self-determination and independence is, however, not so much a matter of individual human rights and fundamental freedoms as a collective right and is therefore inappropriate for inclusion in the covenant.

Economic Social and Cultural Rights

13. The General Assembly decided to include economic, social and cultural rights in the covenant, and the Commission is to be instructed to make provision for them in the draft covenant. It is to be hoped that the General Assembly will reconsider this decision.

14. The advancement of economic, social and cultural rights is a matter of great importance. The traditional civil liberties cannot be fully exercised in the modern world, unless economic and social rights are also promoted and enjoyed. There is therefore a close relationship between the two categories of rights. Generally speaking, however, economic and social rights cannot be protected and encouraged in the same way as civil and political rights. The latter involve limitations on the powers of governments and legislatures to interfere with the rights of the individual. Economic, social and cultural rights, on the other hand, are not so much individual rights as responsibilities of the state in the field of economic policy and social welfare which usually require for their effective implementation detailed social legislation and the creation of appropriate administrative machinery. There is thus a fundamental difference in the nature of the two categories of rights.

15. An attempt to include economic and social rights in the first covenant will jeopardize, if not make impossible, its completion. It will be extremely difficult to reach any general agreement, at least without lengthy delays, on the formulation of these rights in a way that will give rise to workable and enforceable legal remedies.

Measures of Implementation

16. The resolution of the General Assembly under consideration did not, unfortunately, deal adequately with the part of the draft covenant which concerns the measures of implementation. The resolution is limited to a request that consideration be given to the insertion, in the draft covenant or in separate protocols, of provisions for the receipt and examination of petitions from individuals and organizations with respect to alleged violations of the covenant, in addition to the existing provisions for the laying of complaints by signatory governments.

17. There are certain obvious difficulties to be overcome in giving satisfactory effect to the right of petition from individuals or non-governmental organizations. Some machinery would have to be devised, for example, to eliminate frivolous and irresponsible petitions, many of which might be made without any previous attempt to utilize available and adequate local remedies, or might be submitted for purely propaganda, political, malicious, or abusive purposes. The machinery for determining the receivability and best methods of examining and giving effect to private petitions should be studied carefully before extending the measures of implementation in the covenant beyond the laying of complaints by one state party to the covenant against another state which is also a party. It may be noted that only states can at present be parties in cases before the International Court of Justice. The draft covenant as it now stands would appear to contain adequate provisions on implementation.

18. Complaints between states would, under the draft covenant, be investigated by a Human Rights Committee of seven members who shall be persons of high standing and of recognized experience in the field of human rights. The covenant might usefully provide that the Committee should, like the judges of the International Court, be representative of the main forms of civilization and of the principal legal systems of the states parties to the covenant. Consideration might again be given by the Commission to including paragraphs designed to reduce or avoid overlapping between the activities of the Human Rights Committee and those of other organs of the United Nations, and also to provide for a more effective and closer relationship between the functions of the International Court and the Committee.

Provisions for Amendment

19. A minor modification of the final article of the draft covenant, which deals with the process of amendment, might be desirable. In its present form it gives power to a third plus one of the members of the General Assembly to veto a proposed amendment to the covenant. This group might well be comprised entirely of states not parties to the covenant. In order to avoid such a situation the states parties to the covenant should be given more control over the amendment of the instrument. This could be done by re-drafting the last sentence of paragraph 1 of Article 45 and paragraph 2, to read as follows:

"...Any amendment recommended by a two-thirds majority of the States present and voting shall be transmitted by the Secretary-General to the Members of the United Nations and to other States Parties to the Covenant.

2. Unless the General Assembly within twelve months expresses its disapproval of a proposed amendment by a two-thirds majority of the Members present and voting the amendment shall come into force when ratified in accordance with their respective constitutional processes by two-thirds of the States Parties to the Covenant."

Annex to Canadian Statement on Draft Covenant on Human Rights

COMMENTS ON SOME OF THE FIRST EIGHTEEN ARTICLES

1. Paragraph 1 of Article 1 reads as follows: "Each State party hereto undertakes to respect and to ensure to all individuals within its territory and subject to its jurisdiction the rights recognized in this Covenant, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status."; while Article 17 reads: "All are equal before the law: all shall be accorded equal protection of the law without discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status." These provisions are expressed in similar language but are apparently intended to convey different meanings. If so, this should be made clear by the use of more precise language in each article.

2. Article 4 of the present draft now reads: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. In particular, no one shall be subjected against his will to medical or scientific experimentation involving risk, where such is not required by his state of physical or mental health." The second sentence suggests, particularly in the final phrase, a dangerous exception which might be abused, although without this exception the sentence might be interpreted to stand in the way of genuine medical progress. The first sentence of the Article appears to cover adequately the subject of prohibition of torture or cruel punishment. The second sentence should therefore be deleted. With this change the article would be similar to Article 3 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights drawn up by the Council of Europe.

3. Article 8 reads:

"1. Subject to any general law, consistent with the rights recognized in this Covenant:

(a) Everyone legally within the territory of a State shall, within that territory, have the right to (1) liberty of movement and (2) freedom to choose his residence;

(b) Everyone shall be free to leave any country including his own.

2. (a) No one shall be subjected to arbitrary exile.

(b) Subject to the preceding sub-paragraph anyone shall be free to enter the country of which he is a national."

This constitutes a satisfactory definition of freedom of movement, but it is introduced by the vague phrase "Subject to any general law, consistent with the rights recognized in this Covenant". While such a proviso is necessary, it should be more precisely formulated as the phrase has already given rise to different interpretations.

4. Articles 13, 14, 15 and 16 contain formulas providing for limitations on freedom of thought, religion and expression and the rights of assembly and association defined therein, but the formula employed is not uniform and in the interests of good drafting and ease of interpretation, the limitation clause should be expressed in the same way in the four articles, except where a difference in substance is intended. Furthermore, the rights defined in Articles 15 and 16 are expressed in a less direct way than the rights in Articles 13 and 14. It would be better if the form of the first two were followed throughout. The comparable articles in the Council of Europe Convention, namely 9, 10, and 11, appear in some respects to be better drafted and might serve as models for the revision work of the Commission on Human Rights.

5. Several phrases are used in various articles which may be given different meanings under different legal systems or when expressed in different languages. These include the terms, in the English text, "self-defence" in paragraph 2 of Article 3, "arbitrary arrest" in paragraph 1 of Article 6, and "order" or "public order" in Articles 13, 14, 15 and 16. These expressions should be avoided, and the concepts involved stated in other terminology.[38]

GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION TO THE THIRTEENTH SESSION OF ECOSOC GENEVA, JULY 30 — SEPTEMBER 21[39]

Economic Questions

1. In the debate on the financing of economic development the Delegation might be guided by the following considerations:

(a) The first requirement for any substantial increase in the flow of foreign capital to under-developed countries is the creation by them of a favourable economic and political climate and of a suitable institutional framework for mobilizing and channelling their domestic resources and effectively utilizing such assistance as may be given. These are requirements which can only be met through vigorous and constructive action on the part of the governments concerned.

(b) The current scarcity of certain materials and equipment essential to an accelerated programme of economic development constitutes a limiting factor on the rate of progress at the present time.

(c) No convincing arguments have been adduced to justify the creation of new international machinery. The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development was set up for the express purpose of financing economic development and has from the outset received full Canadian support. While Canada would welcome suggestions which would lead to greater effectiveness of the Bank's efforts without jeopardizing the essential soundness and practicability of its operations, we would not favour plans for the creation of new institutions which tend to duplicate the Bank's established facilities or to detract from its future potentialities. Above all, Canada does not concede the desirability or necessity for providing grants for development as part of any arrangement where the would-be recipients are able to exercise undue influence in their own favour. For assistance not available through the Bank, Canada, like the United States, prefers, at this stage, to rely on bilateral arrangements under which agreement can be reached on specific aims, standards and methods, and where donors can maintain the necessary control over the timing, the extent and nature of the assistance given. Moreover, it would be unrealistic to envisage the establishment of an international agency unless there were advance assurance that the principal countries, such as the United States, which might be expected to provide financial backing, were prepared to make the necessary capital available.

2. Canadian participation in the Colombo Plan and in the Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance provides evidence of a genuine desire to give practical support to economic development, and the Delegation might use the particular example of the programme for economic development in South and South-East Asia to illustrate the interest and co-operation of the more industrialized countries.

3. It is important to convince the under-developed countries of the sympathy and good-will of the more advanced countries of the free world, and the Delegation should do what it can towards this end. Therefore, without committing the Canadian Government to any scheme of international financing of economic development or encouraging the establishment of new international machinery, the Delegation could support reasonable resolutions which would keep the issue under review and would provide for examination of specific proposals by governments and appropriate bodies, particularly the International Bank and the International Monetary Fund.

4. The item on restrictive business practices was placed on the agenda by the U.S. which is anxious to have the United Nations initiate measures for international co-operation in the field of monopolies, cartels and restrictive business practices generally. It is understood that the U.S. will propose that ECOSOC convene a special conference to examine this problem and draft a convention. The Delegation might support the principle of the assumption by ECOSOC of responsibility for initiating international action in this field and may vote in favour of convening a special conference to draft a convention. However, if the introduction of the U.S. resolution appears likely to lead to the opening of the whole question of amendments to the GATT at the Sixth Session of the contracting parties, the Delegation should seek further instructions from Ottawa.

Miscellaneous

5. ECOSOC will take action at its summer session on the series of recommendations submitted by the Ad Hoc Committee on the Organization and Operation of the Council and its Commissions. These recommendations are aimed at simplifying the complex structure of the Council and at organizing its work on a more efficient basis. Some functional commissions and sub-commissions would be discontinued, while others would remain in their present form but would meet only when convened by ECOSOC on the recommendation of the Secretary-General. The Council itself would meet three times a year instead of twice and would deal at each session with a smaller agenda of related items. All recommendations of the Ad Hoc Committee are based on a two-year trial period. The Ad Hoc Committee's recommendations might be supported by the Delegation on the understanding that the entire question of ECOSOC organization will be reviewed after a period of two to three years' experience under the changed system of operations.

DRAFT INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON HUMAN RIGHTS

The Economic and Social Council at its Thirteenth Session, opening in Geneva on July 30, will again consider the draft international covenant on human rights. In accordance with the directives given it by the General Assembly, the Commission on Human Rights has now included in the draft covenant a section on economic, social and cultural rights. The Commission has also revised the original articles on implementation and has added a new section on implementation intended to apply to the economic, social and cultural provisions. It deferred action on the revision of the first eighteen articles dealing with civil rights, on the drafting of recommendations concerning a federal state clause, and on the question of petitions from individuals and non-governmental organizations. A copy of the latest draft of the covenant, as submitted by the Commission on Human Rights to the Economic and Social Council, is attached.[40]

2. It is recommended that the instructions set forth in the following paragraphs be given to the Delegation on the various aspects of the draft covenant which may be considered in ECOSOC.

Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

3. The memorandum approved by Cabinet on March 14, 1951, for transmission to the Secretary-General expresses the hope that the General Assembly will re-consider and reverse its decision to include economic, social and cultural rights in the covenant. In support of this position, the memorandum states:

"The advancement of economic, social and cultural rights is a matter of great importance. The traditional civil liberties cannot be fully exercised in the modern world unless economic and social rights are also promoted and enjoyed. There is therefore a close relationship between the two categories of rights. Generally speaking, however, economic and social rights cannot be protected and encouraged in the same way as civil and political rights. The latter involve limitations on the powers of governments and legislatures to interfere with the rights of the individual. Economic, social and cultural rights, on the other hand, are not so much individual rights as responsibilities of the state in the field of economic policy and social welfare which usually require for their effective implementation detailed social legislation and the creation of appropriate administrative machinery. There is thus a fundamental difference in the nature of the two categories of rights.

"An attempt to include economic and social rights in the first covenant will jeopardize, if not make impossible, its completion. It will be extremely difficult to reach any general agreement, at least without lengthy delays, on the formulation of these rights in a way that will give rise to workable and enforceable legal remedies."

These views have been confirmed by the results obtained by the Commission on Human Rights at its Seventh Session in its efforts to draft articles on economic, social and cultural rights and measures for their implementation (Part III and Part V of the revised draft covenant).

4. The United States Delegation to ECOSOC will agree to the inclusion of economic, social and cultural rights unless assured of a majority vote in favour of their deletion. If these rights remain in the covenant, the United States Delegation is authorized to vote for the covenant but will, in that event, read into the records a declaration of understanding of the term "rights" as employed in the economic, social and cultural provisions in contrast to the use of the term "rights" in the civil and political provisions. The gist of this declaration will be that the United States interprets the economic, social and cultural rights included in the covenant as objectives towards which states adhering to the covenant will, within their resources, undertake to strive, by the creation of conditions which will be conducive to the exercise of private as well as public action, for their progressive achievement.

5. The Canadian Delegation to ECOSOC should support any proposal to exclude economic, social and cultural rights from the first covenant on human rights and to deal with these problems separately. Should the majority favour the retention of economic, social and cultural rights in the covenant, the Delegation should support a proposal, which the French delegation is expected to make, to consider the present draft of these articles as a progress report from the Commission and to defer detailed discussion until the Commission submits a complete draft of the covenant. In the event that the Council decides to examine the text of the section containing economic, social and cultural rights, the Delegation should not participate in the debate on this section and should abstain on all votes.

Implementation of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights

6. Part V of the revised draft covenant contains additional articles on implementation, intended as measures of implementation of the economic, social and cultural rights included in the present draft. The Delegation should adopt the same position on this section as on the section containing the economic, social and cultural rights themselves and abstain on any votes taken on individual articles.

Revised Articles on Implementation

7. The Commission on Human Rights, in accordance with General Assembly directives, reconsidered the earlier articles on implementation and made several revisions. The revised text of these implementation articles is to be found in Part IV of the present draft covenant. It is understood that this section on implementation will apply to the first eighteen articles of the covenant, and on that understanding the Delegation could indicate general approval of the Commission's revisions. The most important of these aim at avoiding overlapping between the activities of the Human Rights Committee and those of other organs of the U.N. and at a closer relationship between the functions of the Human Rights Committee and the International Court of Justice and are in line with suggestions contained in the Canadian statement on the draft covenant submitted to the Secretary General.

8. In regard to any other aspects of the draft covenant which may be considered in ECOSOC, the Delegation should be guided by the views contained in the Canadian statement of March 14, 1951, on the draft covenant.[41]

CABINET DOCUMENT NO. 208-51 Ottawa, August 13, 1951

INTERNATIONAL FINANCING OF EUROPEAN EMIGRATION

This is one of the main subjects on the agenda of the 13th Session of ECOSOC. It is a particularly topical one, because the problem of population surpluses in Western Europe has recently been considered by a Tripartite Conference of Experts, by the Council of Europe, by the International Labour Office and by the U.N. Secretariat. I.R.O. is scheduled to terminate operations shortly, and the I.L.O. is preparing detailed plans for entering the operational migration field, to which it hopes to obtain the agreement of governments at its Migration Conference to be held in Naples this coming October.

2. The Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Immigration has considered the matter of European migration generally, and has reached certain conclusions on which a Canadian policy might be based. In brief, it recognizes that mainly due to the war and its aftermath there exists in Western Europe a refugee problem, as well as a general problem of population surpluses. It is in Canada's own practical interest to increase its population by encouraging immigration from such sources. It is also in Canada's political interest to help prevent the spread of Communism by cooperating in any practical measures designed to help solve that overpopulation problem.

[41] Les recommandations figurant dans les documents 247 et 248 ont été approuvées par le Cabinet le 2 août 1951.
The recommendations in Documents 247 and 248 were approved by Cabinet, August 2, 1951.

3. One difficulty is that the character of the present I.L.O. approach to the problem is largely a statistical and demographic one which, while presently restricted to Europe, would in principle at least have equal application to over-population problems in other parts of the world. Asian countries are members of I.L.O. and if this organization were placed in charge of migration work along the lines suggested, this might possibly give rise in the future to embarrassing representations by these countries. Canada's position would be particularly difficult if such representations were made by Asian members of the Commonwealth. Canada is presumably not prepared to alter its present immigration policy and consequently the Canadian delegation should oppose the acceptance of an approach along purely statistical and demographic lines.

4. Insofar as any operational functions to be discharged by an international organization are concerned, it would seem desirable to ensure that,

(a) in the first instance they are limited to the residue of the refugee problem in Europe with possible extension to the emergency surplus population problem in Western European countries with war-torn economies; and

(b) it is clearly understood that the operational services would be simply facilities available at the request of countries of emigration and immigration in carrying out their own migration policies and would not be an instrument for the execution of large-scale international migration programmes which might enter into conflict with the national policies of the countries directly concerned.

Consequently the Committee recommends that Canada should be prepared to consider proposals for the creation of new or extended international migration arrangements of an operational character only if it has been demonstrated that they are urgently required to meet a need such as that referred to in (a), which can only be met efficiently and economically through international action, or if the operational facilities are clearly intended simply to be available for the assistance, on request, of governments of countries of emigration or immigration. In any event, Canada would be unwilling to participate in an operational migration agency unless it made specific provision for the right of Canadian selection of immigrants in accordance with Canadian standards and absorptive capacity, and for limitation on the life of the organization and the area or regions it is to cover.

5. The Committee recommends that, while adopting a cautious attitude to international plans of an operational character, Canada should co-operate in efforts to meet migration problems through the improvement and extension of national or bilateral facilities and the continuation of technical and advisory services now provided internationally.

6. At the 13th Session of ECOSOC, the Canadian Delegation should be guided, in general, by the above considerations, and should carefully avoid any new commitment in the field of migration which runs counter to Canadian policy or practice. It should support any move to defer any decision which might, by implication or otherwise, encourage the I.L.O., or any other international organization to embark upon an operational programme in the field of migration. It should reserve

Canada's position on any matter which might involve a financial commitment. It should also stress the importance of submitting all proposals in detail, and in time for careful study by each government before any decision is taken.

7. Concerning the specific recommendations made in the Secretary General's report, the Canadian Delegation might support any reasonable proposals which encourage the development of national and bilateral action to further European migration, and any proposals which encourage the countries primarily concerned to make use of the existing technical assistance facilities of international organizations, such as the I.L.O., and the loan facilities of the International Bank. Experience has shown that some of these facilities have not been used to the full in the past, whereas others have been too recently developed to permit assessment of their full practical value.

8. On the recommendation made by the Secretary General that international measures concerning migration should be co-ordinated by a single international organization (presumably I.L.O.), the Canadian Delegation should suggest that a decision in this matter be postponed until the next session of ECOSOC. It is not felt that the Secretary General's report demonstrates any necessity for the co-ordination of existing migration services by a single agency, nor does it prove the need for establishing additional operational machinery. Until prior decisions have been taken concerning such matters, and until a clearer picture is obtained of the type of activities which might be undertaken in the future, it would seem premature for the Council to designate an agency responsible for the co-ordination of such activities.

9. The Secretary General also recommends that — should a co-ordinating agency be established — it might be equipped to assume responsibility for the international measures required for the financing of migration, including the establishment of an international revolving fund. Decision in this matter should be postponed, as it would imply that there should be a co-ordinating agency with functions not necessarily limited to Europe, and that it should be financed internationally. The need for this should first be demonstrated. Furthermore, it is unrealistic to speak of an international revolving fund without knowing whether the United States intends giving it adequate financial support, and without knowing the details of the proposed fund, such as its probable size, how it will be administered, and how much immigration countries, such as Canada, will be expected to contribute to it. The 14th session of the Council will take place after the I.L.O. Migration Conference in Naples this coming October. By that time, the Council and participating governments will have had an opportunity to review the whole problem in the light of the more definite plans and proposals to be submitted to the Naples conference.[42] [43]

THE THIRTEENTH SESSION OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL

You will probably by now have received a copy of the Report of the Canadian Delegation to the Thirteenth Session of the Economic and Social Council, held in Geneva July 30—September 22, 1951.† I now enclose a copy of a separate memorandum which contains a general survey and appreciation of the work of the Thirteenth Session. GENERAL SURVEY OF THE THIRTEENTH SESSION
OF THE ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL COUNCIL
GENEVA, JULY 30—SEPTEMBER 22, 1951

Any attempt at an appreciation of a session of ECOSOC must be made against the background of the prevailing political atmosphere, and the work of the Council must be evaluated in relation to the political and ideological conflicts which have now come to influence virtually all its deliberations and decisions. Bearing in mind the stormy return of the Soviet bloc to the previous session in Santiago (Feb-March 1951), following their boycott of the United Nations over the Chinese representation issue, most delegations at the Thirteenth Session in Geneva watched closely during the first few days for an indication of the line which the Cominform members would be likely to adopt. At the outset they appeared to be in an unusually conciliatory mood and the hope spread that perhaps at this session the Council could proceed expeditiously with its business and accomplish some constructive work, relatively unhampered by propaganda warfare. The hope was short-lived, however, and after a few days of comparative harmony, the old battle lines were drawn and the two sides settled down to the usual attacks and counter-attacks. The late arrival of Dr. Katz-Suchy of Poland may have accounted for the delay in the opening of the propaganda offensive by the Cominform bloc (as in Santiago, he was the principal and certainly the most effective spokesman for the Cominform Delegates) but, in any event, after the first week, few opportunities were lost for injecting political controversy into the debates. There was nothing novel or interesting in the Soviet propaganda which was the standard variety consisting largely of violent charges directed against the United States for its warmongering policies and its economic exploitation of under-developed countries. The only noticeable change on the part of the Cominform Delegates since Santiago was in regard to tactics. At the Santiago Session, the constant interruptions, points of order, petty bickering and personal insults created an atmosphere in which it was almost impossible to carry on an orderly discussion. These tactics were discarded at the Thirteenth Session in favour of lengthy repetitive and extremely tiresome discourses which resulted in an appalling waste of time but which permitted the Council to conduct its debates on a reasonably dignified and civilized plane. The Czechoslovak Delegation, while religiously following the party line, continued, as it had done in Santiago, to express adherence to this line with commendable brevity. Dr. Nosek, the Head of the Czechoslovak Delegation and First Vice-President of ECOSOC, is a man of very few words and neither he nor his Delegation can be held responsible for the length of the propaganda debates. In private conversation he expressed his strong disapproval of the interminable and often irrelevant speeches so frequently heard in the Council, and in the light of his own performance, his sincerity should perhaps not be doubted.

2. While the U.S.S.R. and Poland were certainly responsible, especially in the earlier part of the Session, for initiating propaganda debates, the United States, and to a lesser extent, the United Kingdom and France, showed no reluctance in joining battle and on more than one occasion, launched an offensive. In consequence, a considerable proportion of the time of the Thirteenth Session was taken up by four or five member-states for political debate while the great majority, interested in making some progress towards the solution of economic and social problems, was forced to stand by as spectators. The chief Indian Delegate pointed this out at one stage and expressed in strong terms the irritation and frustration of his own Delegation which, he maintained, had come to the Session for other reasons than to listen to the Big Powers fighting their ideological battles on the floor of the Council. Despite the attitude of the Indian Delegation, which is probably shared by many other middle and small powers on the ECOSOC, it seems inevitable that the Council will continue to operate in a strong political atmosphere and it would be unrealistic in the present international climate to expect otherwise. The President of ECOSOC expressed this point of view rather well when, in a private argument with Mr. Arkadiev (the U.S.S.R. Delegate), concerning the proper subject matter for ECOSOC debate, he was overheard to say that all discussions at this particular session could well have been conducted under a single, all-embracing item entitled "Communism versus Capitalism".

3. The other major conflict of interests, that is between developed and under-developed countries, continued unabated. The alignment of delegations was, except for the occasional defection, the same as in the past and again India, in spite of the absence of Sir Ramaswami Mudaliar, played a useful role by exercising a moderating influence on the more extreme delegations in the camp of the under-developed countries.

4. One aspect of the conflict between developed and under-developed countries which seems to be emerging is the tendency on the part of the under-developed countries to air their complaints and grievances and demands frankly and forcefully in spite of the presence of the Cominform delegations and the use they might make of discord in the ranks of the non-communist world. At the Thirteenth Session the attempts of the Cominform Delegations to play up the differences and drive a wedge between the developed and under-developed countries failed, largely because of the effective handling given them by the delegations of the under-developed countries themselves. Too much weight should not perhaps be attached to this development on the basis of one session's experience but it may indicate that in future the under-developed countries will insist upon bringing differences and disagreements into the open and discussing them fully and frankly and that they will not pull any punches for fear of providing the Soviet bloc with handy ammunition for propaganda warfare.

5. In the light of the conflict between the Soviet Union and the Western democracies and considering the very lengthy agenda (58 items) including many items of major importance and of a highly controversial character, the results of the Thirteenth Session of the Council, while not inspiring, are not too discouraging. Certain long-term problems were brought a little nearer to solution, some problems were attacked for the first time and a few projects were recognized as unattainable in the immediate future. Furthermore, certain international economic problems formerly dealt with outside the framework of ECOSOC were given serious attention at this Session and, as a result of action taken, one or two of these issues may be handled in future by international machinery operated in some kind of loose relationship with the Council.

6. Most of the major items on the agenda of the Thirteenth Session were economic in character and a detailed account of the discussions held and decisions taken is to be found in the Report of the Delegation. In the present general survey of the Session's achievements in the economic field, special mention might be made of the items dealing with economic development, technical assistance, land reform, commodity arrangements and restrictive business practices.

7. The economic development of under-developed countries is undoubtedly the most important and the most difficult of the economic items on the Council's agenda, partly because of the magnitude of the problem, from the strictly economic point of view, and partly because of the important political implications. The President of the Council, in his closing speech, underlined the political aspect when, paraphrasing Lincoln, he said: "There cannot be a peaceful world, half prosperous and half destitute".

8. As was to be expected, the Council devoted a great deal of time both in the preliminary meeting of the Economic Committee and in the Plenary meetings of the Council to discussions on economic development. There was the usual alignment of delegations with the representatives of the more advanced and industrialised countries holding their positions against the strong pressure brought to bear upon them by the under-developed countries of Asia and Latin America. The final resolution adopted by the Council follows the general pattern of previous resolutions on this item with the important addition that it gives a nod of approval to the idea that an International Finance Corporation should be established to promote financing of productive private enterprise either through loans without government guarantee or through equity investments. This was one of the recommendations of the group of experts established by the Council in 1950 to study and report on unemployment and under-employment in under-developed countries. The International Bank is asked under the resolution to study this matter further and to report to the Fourteenth Session of the Council.

9. The United Nations Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance which is now well under way was given detailed and thorough study by the Technical Assistance Committee and, as a result, the administrative and financial arrangements for its operation were placed on a sounder and more effective basis. It was decided, inter alia, to establish a reserve fund of $3,000,000 and also to increase the proportion of the Technical Assistance Fund which the Technical Assistance Board would be responsible for allocating. This means that instead of automatically allocating almost all the contributions received to the participating agencies on a fixed percentage basis as is done under the provisions for the first financial period, a substantial sum, amounting to well over half the anticipated Fund, will be held for allocation by the Technical Assistance Board in accordance with certain general principles. These new financial arrangements require approval of the General Assembly but it is unlikely that there will be any important opposition.

10. The tremendous problem of land reform was discussed at the Thirteenth Session for the first time as a direct consequence of a resolution adopted by the General Assembly in 1950 on the initiative of the Polish Delegation. Like economic development, with which it is closely related, the issue of land reform has obvious social and political implications and the successful handling of this item required a nice balance of vigour and tact on the part of the leading western members of the Council. The United States regarded the subject as of considerable propaganda importance and was anxious to take the principal role away from the Cominform Delegations. A draft resolution submitted by the United States and subsequently amended by various delegations was eventually adopted after a lengthy and controversial debate. It is accepted on all sides that the achievement of sound land reforms will be a slow and gradual process and that different methods of implementation will be applicable to different countries. The Council's resolution, therefore, does not urge immediate radical changes but it does recognize the need for reform in the systems of land tenure prevailing in many parts of the world and it does set forth the various fields in which action can be taken toward this end by the governments concerned. The resolution also recognizes that in many countries appropriate measures of land reform must be regarded as a necessary precondition for economic development. Thus, a start has been made toward the solution of a widespread and basic economic problem; it is unquestionably a long-term project but any progress made towards its implementation will, like the technical assistance programme, help to lay a firm foundation for sound economic development. The acceptance by the under-developed countries themselves of the importance of technical assistance and of land reform can perhaps be interpreted as a healthy tendency towards recognition of the fact that real economic development cannot be measured in terms of increased industrialization alone.

11. The Council's resolution on procedures for inter-governmental consultation on problems of primary commodities is not in itself of particular importance since it maintains on a temporary basis the Interim Co-ordinating Committee on International Commodity Arrangements (with a new procedure for the appointment of a chairman) and postpones until 1952 detailed consideration of permanent procedures for convening international commodity conferences. The real significance of this item lies in the desire of the United States to work out arrangements whereby the Secretariat of GATT would be integrated into the United Nations. This is a manoeuvre of the United States Administration to avoid the necessity of seeking the specific approval of Congress for the United States share of the GATT budget, a request which they fear would be turned down in the light of the Congressional attitude towards the ITO. Should the Council agree to the proposal which the United States Delegation is expected to submit to the next session, GATT will continue to operate independently but some kind of formal relationship with ECOSOC will have to be established and to that extent, it will be brought into association with the United Nations.

12. Another economic problem which was brought before the Council for the first time at the Thirteenth Session was the question of international action to prevent restrictive business practices. The United States, which placed this item on the agenda, wants an international convention to prohibit international cartels. The Council dealt with this issue at the Thirteenth Session by setting up an ad hoc committee on restrictive business practices consisting of 10 Member States, including Canada, which is directed to study the problem and submit proposals to the Council not later than March, 1953, on methods to be adopted by international agreement to prevent restrictive business practices in international trade.

13. Most of the social items on the agenda of the Thirteenth Session were of relatively minor importance or concerned problems of a continuing nature which required little discussion. In the field of human rights, however, the agenda included two major and highly controversial subjects, the Draft Convention on Freedom of Information and the Draft Covenant on Human Rights.

14. In 1948, an international conference on freedom of information, held in Geneva, prepared a draft convention on freedom of information, which was submitted to the General Assembly. Action on the draft convention was twice deferred by the General Assembly in the light of the wide divergence of views on the subject, and at its 1950 Session, the Assembly established an ad hoc Committee to draw up a new text for submission to ECOSOC at its Thirteenth Session. The Council was directed to consider the draft convention and decide whether a plenipotentiary conference should be convened to frame and sign the final convention. The Canadian Government, after full consultation with press associations and other information agencies in Canada, decided that the draft convention was unacceptable and that in the present international political climate, the United Nations should not proceed with the attempt to establish a convention in this field. The discussion on this subject in the Council gave rise to a prolonged and contentious debate. Eventually, however, the Canadian view, supported by other like-minded delegations, prevailed and the Council decided against the calling of a plenipotentiary conference.

15. The Draft Covenant on Human Rights, which has been in the process of preparation for the past two years, was revised by the Commission on Human Rights at its 1951 spring session and submitted to the Thirteenth Session of the Council. The Commission was unable to complete the full revision of the Draft Covenant but, in accordance with directives given it by the General Assembly, it drafted articles providing for economic, social and cultural rights, as well as special provisions for the implementation of these rights. Since the Draft Covenant was still incomplete, there was no inclination on the part of the Council to undertake a detailed study of the text and the debate centred upon the two new sections dealing with economic, social and cultural rights and measures for their implementation. Here also, the Council avoided examination of the individual articles and confined its discussion to the preliminary question whether this category of rights should be included in the first international covenant.

16. The Canadian Delegation, in accordance with the previous Canadian position toward the merging of economic, social and cultural rights with civil and political rights in a single covenant, and in accordance with specific instructions given it by Cabinet, urged that the Council request the General Assembly to reconsider the decision taken last year to combine all these rights in one instrument. In spite of the practical and logical arguments put forward by the Canadian Delegation against an attempt to include in a single covenant two categories of rights so different in their nature, many delegations stoutly maintained their previous position and insisted that economic, social and cultural rights could not be separated from civil and political rights and that the latter were useless to a man who was deprived of the former. A few delegations, however, though they shared these views, were prepared in the face of the arguments put forward by Canada and others to resubmit the question to the General Assembly. In the end, a resolution was adopted by a small majority which requests the Commission on Human Rights to complete its unfinished business and which requests the General Assembly to reconsider its decision concerning the inclusion of economic, social and cultural rights in the first covenant.

17. It is discouraging that the action taken by ECOSOC in regard to the two major human rights problems before it could not have been more positive. On the other hand, the decisions taken reflect a realistic appreciation of the difficulties involved and in that sense, can perhaps be regarded as demonstrating a more practical approach to international problems.

18. The problem of coordination was again given prolonged and detailed consideration at the Thirteenth Session, with the United States taking the lead in urging more positive action by ECOSOC in this field. Although no new measures of coordination were adopted by the Council at this Session, the United States Delegation served notice of its intention to introduce at the next Session a resolution setting forth certain broad programmes or fields of work which ECOSOC might recognize to be of major importance, and might recommend to specialized agencies for their guidance. While there may be some merit in this proposal, the woolly arguments advanced by the United States Delegation and its confused explanation of the concept of priorities which it was advocating, give rise to the fear that the "broad programmes" to be presented to the next Session may be so broad as to defeat the aim of coordination, that is concentration of effort.

19. The Coordination Committee attempted to examine the programmes of the specialized agencies and of the commissions of the Council in the light of the criteria for establishing priorities adopted at the Eleventh Session and subsequently approved by the General Assembly in 1950. The examination of programmes was, necessarily, perfunctory, and did not result in a single recommendation for the deletion of a single project. So far as specialized agencies are concerned, it is apparent that coordination can be achieved more effectively by the Administrative Committee on Coordination (a standing body composed of the Secretary General of the U.N. and the Directors General of all the specialized agencies), by day-to-day contacts between the secretariats of the U.N. and the agencies, and by governments themselves on a national level, rather than by the Council. The practical role of the Council is to apply continuous pressure to prevent overlapping, duplication and proliferation. So far as the commissions of the Council are concerned, the Council can and should exercise more control. This can be done by reviewing carefully the tasks assigned to the commissions, and by having the commissions themselves, in drafting their programmes, indicate the relative importance of individual projects.

20. The item on the re-organization of the Council and its commissions was discussed in detail both in the Coordination Committee and at plenary meetings of the Council. There was a wide divergence of views on almost every aspect of this question and as a result it was impossible to reach general agreement on any radical changes in organization or structure. The Council's final decisions fall far short of basic reorganization but they do provide for elimination of some of the subsidiary bodies and for less frequent sessions of others and they should bring about more business-like methods in the operation of the Council itself. The Economic Employment and Development Commission, the Sub-Commissions on Freedom of Information, on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities and on Statistical Sampling are to be discontinued. All other commissions except Human Rights and Narcotic Drugs, are to meet, normally, every second year instead of annually as hitherto.

21. During the discussion on this item, a good deal of time was devoted to the problem of the waste of time caused by unnecessary duplication of debate. The question arose out of a proposal submitted by the Canadian Delegate, and subsequently withdrawn in the face of strong opposition, to limit the length of statements for the final period of the Session. The issue was referred to the Coordination Committee to consider in relation to the whole problem of the re-organization of the Council. Various suggestions were made, aimed at restricting repetition of debate, but although the final text of the resolution submitted to the vote was mild and reasonable, it was defeated both in Committee and in the Council by a very close vote. Several of the delegations which opposed the motion made it clear that they were sympathetic to the objective but that they could not support the proposed procedure which they interpreted to impose limitations on freedom of speech. The failure of this attempt to reduce by even a small percentage the fruitless and time-consuming repetition of debate in the Council was discouraging. It is, of course, possible that the very discussion of the matter and the strong stand taken by the leading Western countries may persuade the more verbose non-communist members to exercise self-discipline but it would be the height of optimism to expect much along this line.

TELEGRAM 66 Ottawa, January 12, 1951

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES

Following for Mr. Pearson from Heeney, Begins: Reference paragraph 2 of teletype No. 3 of January 3, 1951,† from the Permanent Representative regarding the Negotiating Committee on Contributions to Korean Relief and Palestine Refugees.

1. You will recall that on December 9, 1950, you decided to delay the submission of the Memorandum to Cabinet on a further Canadian contribution for Palestine refugees until a paper on general external air policy could be presented. We have in the meantime been carrying on discussions with the Department of Finance. In informal discussions members of the Department have had with Deutsch and Pollock there was tentative agreement on the terms of a Memorandum to Cabinet requesting a contribution of $750,000 for the period of January 1, 1951 to June 30, 1951, and $1,250,000 for the period of July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952, the larger part of this latter sum to be contributed solely to the Re-integration Fund for permanent resettlement. Clark, (quite rightly I think) is inclined to take a cautious view, particularly in the absence of his Minister. He points out that, in face of the large additional requirements for defence and under federal-provincial agreements, Ministers are bound to look narrowly at appeals for relief and assistance abroad. He welcomes, however, the approach to the general problem by means of an estimate of external aid in general. He is interested in the "community chest" principle.

2. We are pressing forward consideration of a general external aid policy, but there are far-reaching considerations involved and it is unlikely that a satisfactory memorandum on this subject could be ready for Cabinet in the next week or two. I think, therefore, that we should probably put forward the Palestine relief question separately and as soon as convenient to you. We should give an answer as soon as possible to the Negotiating Committee, which has for some weeks been consulting member states on their contributions and pressing them for firm commitments. In all fairness to Kennedy we should assist in giving him at an early date an indication of the amount which he will have at his disposal if we are to expect him to plan the long-range programmes which we have urged.

3. The general memorandum will be concerned with laying down a system of priorities on contributions Canada may be called upon to make in the future. The Palestine memorandum, on the other hand, will deal with a specific request to which Canada is partially committed through the Government's decision of June 12, 1950, to consider sympathetically a further request for $750,000 for the period of January 1, 1951, to June 30, 1951.

4. I am sending this by teletype in case you have to remain in New York over the week-end. If you return tomorrow I shall not of course expect a reply until I see you. Ends.

Note du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], January 18, 1951

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES

I refer to our conversation of January 15 on the above subject, and have set forth below, as requested, the pros and cons of having Palestine relief dealt with separately by Cabinet, or alternatively, of having it considered as part of the general paper on Canadian external assistance now in preparation in the Department.

Reasons Why the Question Should be Dealt With Separately by Cabinet

1. Dealing with it separately would mean dealing with it sooner, since the general paper will not be ready for your consideration for another ten days, and by Cabinet for some time after this. Speed would be an advantage in view of our commitments (see below para 3).

2. Parliament meets on January 30. If the matter is dealt with now, it would probably be possible to consider it more objectively and on its merits. If it had to be discussed after the session had started, it is possible that extraneous domestic political considerations might affect the discussion.

3. The Canadian Government is already at least half committed to finding additional funds because of the following:

(a) The Cabinet decision of July 12 which states that if the initial sum of $750,000 has been used up by December 31, 1950, and if General Kennedy requires more funds "the Canadian Government would give sympathetic consideration to a request for a further sum of $750,000".

(b) General Kennedy has already made such a request in a telegram of January 2, 1951.†

4. General Kennedy is a Canadian, and it would perhaps be regarded as unfortunate if Canada appeared to be unduly hesitant in supporting his request.

5. The bulk of the money will be spent in Canada for the purchase of Canadian goods.

6. Canada is a member of the Negotiating Committee for Korea and Palestine refugees. Since this committee is engaged in asking other governments to give funds, it might be thought that Canada should itself set an early example in this regard.

7. Early and sympathetic consideration of General Kennedy's request would be a gesture that would gain for us the goodwill of the independent Arab world, with its seven members of the United Nations, its population of 45 million, and its strategic position on the "marches" of the Western world.

8. The Department of Finance has already agreed informally to put forward a tentative scheme asking Cabinet to authorise a contribution of $750,000 for the period January 1, 1951 to June 30, 1951; and of $1,250,000 for the period July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952, subject to certain reservations.

Reasons Why the Question Should be Dealt With as Part of the General Paper on Canadian External Assistance

1. Having Cabinet deal piecemeal with individual requests is unsatisfactory, since the intermittent recurrence of items similar to Palestine relief might well produce in Cabinet a sense of exasperation, especially at a time when an interest in defence is paramount.

2. The presentation of Palestine relief as one part of a general program of Canadian external assistance would, in the long run, enable Cabinet to put the entire question on a stable financial and policy basis. It would set both upper and lower limits to Canadian contributions which would probably not be disturbed for a full year, with resultant advantages to both the donor and the recipient country.

3. If Palestine relief is discussed while Parliament is in session, a more accurate assessment of public and House support for this kind of contribution would be forthcoming. Action might then be taken on a somewhat more realistic basis.

4. Since at this time almost all expenditures which do not bear directly on the defence effort are likely to be viewed askance, there might be an advantage in discussing the whole question of international relief in relation to our defence commitments. A corollary to such discussion would be that once a specific overall contribution were agreed to, it would not be a target for criticism.

5. No funds are at the moment available, and supplementary estimates would have to be passed if Palestine relief were carried as a separate item.

6. Having Cabinet deal piecemeal with individual requests puts an unfair burden of responsibility on this Department.

UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES

I refer to my memorandum of January 18 setting forth the pros and cons of having Palestine Relief dealt with separately by Cabinet or deferred and considered as part of the general programme on external assistance, a paper on which has recently been prepared in the Department.[44]

2. We are reminded by the Finance Division that the item of $750,000 for use in the period January 1 to June 30, 1951 must, if it is to be voted, be included in the supplementary estimates for 1950-51.

3. We are also reminded that the item of $1,250,000 for use in the period July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952, must be included in the final estimates for 1951-52, which will shortly be closed.

4. In the light of the above considerations I should be grateful for your decision as to whether Palestine relief should be considered now as a separate item, in order that the necessary financial submissions may be made.[45]

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au directeur de l'Office de secours et de travaux des Nations Unies pour les refugiés de Palestine

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Director, United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees

Ottawa, March 9, 1951

Dear General Kennedy,

I should like to acknowledge your letter of February 14† as well as your subsequent telegram of March 8† in which you emphasized the difficulties your Agency would experience in initiating even a modest reintegration programme, unless the contributions pledged on a conditional basis for the period of January 1 to June 30, 1951 were made available to you, either in cash or kind, at the earliest possible date.

2. You will be glad to learn that Cabinet, on February 21, agreed to a further Canadian appropriation of $750,000 for the Relief and Works Agency.[46] This appreciation will be submitted to Parliament before the end of the current fiscal year as part of the final supplementary estimates for 1950-51. It is our intention, as soon as parliamentary approval of the Canadian contribution to UNRWAPR has been secured, to transfer the funds appropriated to the Canadian Commercial Corporation for the account of your Agency.

3. I am not in a position, at the moment, to indicate what contribution the Canadian Government might decide to make to the reintegration programme authorized by the General Assembly on December 2, 1950. The Government is, of course, aware of the extent to which a restoration of political stability in the Middle East depends upon a speedy and permanent solution of the refugee problem. It has also noted with satisfaction the recent decision of the Arab League calling upon member governments to co-operate with the appropriate United Nations agencies in dealing with this problem and to consider the resettlement of the Palestine refugees in the Arab countries as a matter of urgency. In view of these developments I agree that it would be unfortunate if, for lack of financial resources, no more than a shadow programme could be undertaken at this stage.

4. At the same time, you will appreciate the fact that any decision reached by the Government in respect of a further contribution to the Relief and Works Agency will have to be made in the light of the total funds which Canada may be called upon to provide for external relief and development. Moreover we shall, no doubt, have to take into consideration the response of other countries in a position somewhat similar to that of Canada. If these countries can be persuaded to assume a substantial share of the financial responsibilities entailed by the reintegration programme, and if the total pledged contributions are sufficient to guarantee the successful initiation of such a programme, the Canadian Government would be in a better position to give sympathetic consideration to submitting to Parliament, before the end of the present Session, an appropriation for a reasonable Canadian contribution.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

Note du chef par intérim de la Direction des Nations Unies pour le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Acting Head, United Nations Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], April 29, 1951

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION TO RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES

You will recall that, on December 2, 1950, the General Assembly adopted a resolution authorizing UNRWAPR to set up a $20,000,000 fund for the contribution of direct relief for the period July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952, and a reintegration fund of $30,000,000 for the permanent re-establishment of the refugees and their consequent removal from relief. The Canadian Delegation supported this resolution on the distinct understanding that the extension of further international assistance to the Arab refugees would be designed to facilitate their final transition to permanent reintegration in the economy of the area, whether this be achieved by resettlement in the Arab countries or by repatriation to the territory now under the jurisdiction of Israel.

2. There can be little doubt that the restoration of political and economic stability in the Middle East depends, to a substantial degree, on a final solution of the Arab refugee problem. The solution of this problem might, in due course, pave the way for a reconciliation between the Arab States and Israel. For the moment, however, the provision of international aid for the reintegration of the refugees would at least have the effect of ensuring the progressive elimination of a problem for the genesis of which, in the view of the Arab States, the Western democracies bear a major responsibility, and which has, to some degree, stood in the way of an effective alignment of the Arab States with the other free nations of the world.

3. The political outlook for a settlement of the Arab refugee question is exceedingly favourable at the moment. During the course of its meetings in the early part of this year, the Political Committee of the Arab League decided to call upon member governments of the League to co-operate with the appropriate agencies of the United Nations in dealing with the refugee problem, and to regard the resettlement of the refugees in the Arab countries as a matter of urgency. The Government of Israel, for its part, has reaffirmed its willingness to pay fair compensation for lands abandoned by the refugees. In these circumstances it would be particularly unfortunate if, for lack of funds with which to implement reasonable reintegration projects, the Relief and Works Agency should be precluded from taking advantage of the broad acceptance of the principle of refugee reintegration.

4. The Agency is, in fact, proceeding with its plans for agreements with a number of Arab governments on the assumption that the necessary funds will be forthcoming to finance various reintegration projects which are at present the subject of discussions between the Agency and the governments of Egypt, Jordan and Syria. These projects include the resettlement of approximately 50,000 refugees in the Sinai Peninsula on the basis of proposals submitted by the Egyptian Government, as well as a large housing construction programme at Amman, the capital of Jordan. The Agency is also exploring the possibility of resettling some of the refugees in Libya, and the French authorities in North Africa have agreed, in principle, to accept for repatriation and care for several hundred refugees of North African origin.

5. The Canadian Government has not thus far indicated to the Negotiating Committee on Contributions to Programmes of Relief and Rehabilitation what contribution, if any, it might be prepared to consider for the 1951-1952 relief and reintegration programme for Palestinian Arab refugees. As you will recall, General Kennedy, the State Department and the Foreign Office have recently approached us to ascertain the probable level of our contribution. Mr. Bevin, in fact, suggested in his letter of January 24† that, on the basis of our assessment for the apportionment of United Nations expenses, an appropriation of $1,650,000 might not represent an unreasonable share for Canada to assume.

6. In replying to these approaches we have pointed out that any further Canadian contribution to the Relief and Works Agency would be contingent upon (1) the continued co-operation of the Arab States and (2) a broader response to the Agency's appeal for funds on the part of countries in a position comparable with that of Canada. In this latter respect the prospects are not encouraging. The report of the Negotiating Committee, dated January 26, shows that, apart from the United States and United Kingdom pledges of $25,000,000 and $8,000,000 respectively, twelve other member states of the United Nations promised no more than an aggregate total of $882,000. We understand that both the United States and the United Kingdom would now be prepared to consider increasing their initial offers, provided that a more generous response on the part of other countries ensured the full realization of the Agency's goal of $50,000,000.

7. In the light of the political considerations outlined above and more especially in view of the emphasis which we have consistently placed in the General Assembly upon a final solution of the Arab refugee problem, I wonder if we might not now submit to Cabinet a recommendation for a Canadian Government contribution to the Relief and Works Agency's 1951-1952 programme. If you concur in this course of action, I assume that the necessary memorandum to the Cabinet should be drawn up in time for this item to be included in the supplementary estimates for the current fiscal year which, I understand, will come up for consideration by Parliament some time in the middle of June.

8. An equitable Canadian contribution to the $50,000,000 programme might be related to Canada's share in the regular budget of the United Nations, which is 3.3%. Although this percentage would point to a contribution of $1,650,000, we might recommend that, in view of our increasing commitments for similar programmes in other parts of the world, the Canadian contribution be tentatively set at a maximum of $1,250,000 in Canadian funds. This figure, which would represent approximately 3.3% of the total contributions to the programme pledged to date, was provisionally agreed to by Messrs. Deutsch and Pollock of the Department of Finance last December, when a member of this Division discussed the proposed level of a Canadian contribution to the 1951-52 relief and reintegration programme with them. Despite the General Assembly's decision to the effect that the $50,000,000 programme be divided between reintegration and relief in the ratio of 60:40, Messrs. Deutsch and Pollock insisted that our contribution should be allocated to the Relief and Works Agency in the ratio of 80:20. They considered that such a division of funds would be no more than appropriate in the light of our firmly expressed and frequently reiterated view that the relief functions of the Agency should be progressively reduced and that international assistance should be applied to the permanent re-establishment of the refugees.

9. If you agree with the substance of these recommendations, you may wish this Division to prepare a memorandum to the Cabinet in consultation with the Economic, European and Finance Divisions and the Department of Finance.

G.C. McINNES

SECRET [Ottawa], May 30, 1951

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE REINTEGRATION FUND OF UNRWAPR, FOR THE PERIOD JULY 1, 1951 TO JUNE 30, 1952

The attached draft of a submission to Cabinet for a Canadian contribution to the Reintegration Fund of UNRWAPR, for the coming operating year, July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952, is submitted for your consideration and comments.

You may perhaps think that the figure of $250,000 which we suggest is too low and that we should set our sights higher. Our reasons for suggesting the low figure are as follows:

(a) the reluctance of the Department of Finance to concur in our second contribution of $750,000 to UNRWAPR relief, and their statement that "Cabinet's authorization for this contribution ought to be conditional upon the Agency securing contributions from others, as well as the relatively few countries which have already contributed, and that what we contribute for the whole year ending next June should not be disproportionate to actual collections, as well as to the general plan of contributions that was originally considered."

(b) the poor showing to date in pledged contributions to the Reintegration Fund of countries other than the United Kingdom, the United States, France and Israel, who have no direct interest in this problem; i.e. countries comparable to Canada.

The suggested sum of $250,000 would be more than twice as great as the next largest contribution of $110,000, from Mexico, and it would be more than half of the total contributions of the countries mentioned in paragraph 2(b) above. However, should you consider that the climate is now more favourable for seeking Cabinet approval of a larger contribution, I should be grateful for your comments in order that we may redraft this submission accordingly.[47]

A.D.P. H[EENEY]

P.S. I think myself that you are not in a very strong position to recommend any further contribution because of the failure of other governments to come forward and because of our relatively large contributions previously — unless further contribution from us is made conditional on comparable contributions from others.

Projet de soumission pour le Cabinet

Draft Submission to Cabinet

SECRET [Ottawa], May 30, 1951

RE CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE REINTEGRATION FUND OF THE UNITED NATIONS RELIEF AND WORKS AGENCY FOR PALESTINE REFUGEES FOR THE PERIOD JULY 1, 1951 TO JUNE 30, 1952

During the past year the Canadian Government has contributed $1,500,000 (Candn) to UNRWAPR for purposes of direct relief. The Secretary General of the United Nations in a note dated May 21, 1951, now informs the government that a contribution from Canada is most urgently needed for the reintegration programme of UNRWAPR. He characterizes the programme as an "acute emergency operation".

2. The response, in the past year, of those nations which like Canada, have no direct interest in the problem of Palestinian refugees, to the appeal of the Director-General of UNRWAPR for contributions, has been disappointing. Contributions in U.S. dollars, promised by governments for the period ending June 30, 1951, amounted to $37,927,600. $27,450,000 was contributed by the United States, $6,160,000 by the United Kingdom, $2,856,000 by France and, of the balance of $1,461,600, $690,000 was contributed by Canada. Contributions in kind for the same period amounted to $921,441.00, of which flour and dried codfish to the value of $735,000 were provided by Canada. Direct aid and services to UNRWAPR, anticipated from Middle East governments, for the same period, amounted to $1,127,876.

[47] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
U.N. Div[ision] where are we being pressed? by whom? & how? Memo for Minister please returning this one with it A.D.P.H[eeney]. June 2.

3. Although substantial progress has been made in the past three years in alleviating the plight of Arab refugees in Palestine, their situation remains deplorable. Apart from obvious humanitarian considerations, unless positive action is taken to integrate the lives of these unfortunate people into the surrounding Arab states, a situation will continue to exist which can only lead to anarchy and confusion in this strategic area.

4. The present outlook for a settlement of the Arab refugee question appears more hopeful than it has in the past. During the course of its meetings in the early part of this year, the political committee of the Arab League decided to call upon member governments of the League to co-operate with the appropriate agencies of the United Nations in dealing with the refugee problem, and to regard a settlement of the refugees in the Arab countries as a matter of urgency. The Government of Israel, for its part, has re-affirmed its willingness to pay fair compensation for lands abandoned by the refugees. In these circumstances, it would be unfortunate if, for lack of funds with which to implement reasonable reintegration projects, the Relief and Works Agency should be precluded from taking advantage of the broad acceptance of the principle of refugee reintegration.

5. The agency is now proceeding with its plans for agreements with a number of Arab governments on the assumption that the necessary funds will be forthcoming to finance the various reintegration projects.

6. The United States and the United Kingdom, the two largest contributors, have indicated that they would donate a minimum of $25,000,000 and $8,000,000 respectively. The Canadian High Commissioner in London informs us that the United Kingdom is prepared to increase its contribution from $8,000,000 to $9,000,000, provided that the United States Government is prepared to increase its contribution from $25,000,000 to $27,000,000. The United Kingdom government further states that it is also prepared to make an additional increase to bring its contribution up to $10,000,000 provided that:

(a) the United States increase their contribution to $30,000,000;

(b) the major contributors (apart from the United Kingdom and the United States) improve on their last year's contribution; and

(c) some other governments which have not so far contributed make offers.

The Canadian ambassador in Washington has been informed by the State Department that the United States is now prepared to include in its Economic Assistance Bill an amount of $50,000,000 as the United States contribution to UNRWAPR.

7. Contributions by member states, other than the United States and the United Kingdom are as follows:

Member States
Denmark	$ 53,000
Egypt	390,000
France	2,856,000
Greece	50,000
Honduras	2,500
Indonesia	30,000
Israel	50,000
Lebanon	33,000
Luxembourg	2,000
Mexico	110,000
Norway	14,000
Pakistan	90,000
Philippines	10,000
Saudi Arabia	115,000
Sweden	20,000
Syria	60,000
Venezuela	20,000
Yemen	(large quantity of cereal)
Southern Rhodesia	19,600

8. The total contributions offered to date thus amount to $36,925,100. When the United States contribution is raised from $25,000,000 to $50,000,000 and the United Kingdom from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 the resulting sum of $63,925,100 will be considerably more than the Agency goal of $50,000,000.

9. In the light of these considerations, it is recommended that,

(1) Parliamentary approval be sought for an initial contribution in Canadian dollars of $250,000 for the reintegration fund of UNRWAPR, for the period July 1, 1951 to June 30, 1952;

(2) authority be granted to inform the United Nations Negotiating Committee that Cabinet will seek Parliamentary approval in January, 1952 for a further appropriation provided that, during the intervening period the contributions of countries other than the United Kingdom, the United States, France and Israel show a reasonable increase. If this occurs, and the total contributions from such countries amount to $3,000,000, Canada will give another $250,000; if $4,000,000, another $500,000; if $5,000,000, another $750,000. At the $5,000,000 level our total contribution would be $1,000,000.

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO THE RELIEF AND REINTEGRATION PROGRAMME OF UNRWAPR

I return, as requested, my memorandum to you of May 30. You will recall that, when we discussed this memorandum, you asked me to let you know where we were being pressed, by whom, and how.

2. In a note dated May 21, 1951,† the Secretary General of the United Nations has reminded the Government that the operational year of UNRWAPR will begin on July 1, 1951. He states that it is most urgent that our contribution be made available "at the earliest possible date", and he expresses the hope that appropriate legislative action by the Government will "make such early payment feasible". He characterizes the programmes of both UNKRA and UNRWAPR as "acute emergency operations".

3. As you know, the Government has already contributed $1 1/2 million to the current Relief and Works Programme of UNRWAPR, which will terminate on June 30 of this year. Response to this programme from countries comparable to Canada, and with no direct interest in the problem of Palestine refugees, was disappointing and, in fact, the Canadian contribution equalled the total contributions of these countries.

4. You will recall the reluctance of the Department of Finance to concur in our second contribution of $750,000 to UNRWAPR. They stated that "Cabinet's authorization for this contribution ought to be conditional upon the agency securing contributions from others, as well as the relatively few countries which have already contributed, and that what we contribute for the whole year ending next June should not be disproportionate to actual collections, as well as to the general plan of contributions that was originally considered" (Letter from Mr. R.B. Bryce, Department of Finance, dated December 9, 1950).

5. To date the showing in pledged contributions to the Relief and Reintegration Programme of countries other than the United Kingdom, the United States and France, has been poor. I am therefore inclined to doubt whether we are in a strong position to recommend any further contribution, both because of the failure of the governments of countries comparable to Canada to come forward, and because of our previous relatively large contributions.

6. I therefore attach for your comments or approval a draft of a note to the Secretary General in reply to his note of May 21, 1951. Our reply states that, while we appreciate the urgency of his request, he is no doubt aware of our previous contributions, which are equal to those of all other countries save the United States, the United Kingdom and France. We further state that evidence of a more equitable distribution of the financial burdens which will be incurred in the implementation of the forthcoming programme will have a definite bearing on any decision as to a further contribution which may be reached by the Canadian Government.

7. On the other hand, should you consider that the time is now ripe to ask Cabinet for a contribution to the Relief and Reintegration Programme, I should be grateful for your instructions. Our previous suggestion, as set forth in the draft memorandum to Cabinet of May 30, was that we give $250,000 immediately, and that if, between now and January 1952, countries comparable to Canada were to increase their contributions, our own contribution might be increased on a pro rata basis.

LETTER NO. 35 Ottawa, June 20, 1951

Sir:

I have the honour to acknowledge your note SD 34/2/01 of May 21, 1951,† in which you bring to my attention the report (A/1601) of the Negotiating Committee on contributions to programmes of Relief and Rehabilitation in Korea and Relief and Reintegration of Palestine Refugees. I note that this report reflects the present status of fund raising efforts for the two programmes, and I am grateful to you for drawing my attention to the fact that the report notes the confirmation of the Government of Canada's offer to the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency, and to the fact that the funds have already been deposited to the special account under your jurisdiction.

2. You indicate that it is your understanding that the matter of continued support for Palestine refugees is under consideration by the Government of Canada, and you inform me that, as the operational year of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees will begin on July 1, 1951, it is most urgent that a Canadian contribution be made available at the earliest possible date.

3. As you are aware, a Canadian contribution of $1,500,000 has already been made to the Relief and Works Programme of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees, which will terminate on June 30. At the same time, the Government of Canada has been disappointed by the lack of support for the current programme from countries other than the United States, the United Kingdom and France. You will have noted that the Canadian contribution of $1,500,000 exceeds the total contributions from all other countries, exclusive of the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

4. Before considering a contribution to the Relief and Reintegration Programme for the year 1951-52, the Government of Canada is strongly of the opinion that a more equitable distribution of the financial burdens which will be incurred in its implementation should be assured. The Government of Canada's disposition to continue its support of this great humanitarian enterprise, can hardly be divorced from its concern at the lack of equivalent support from countries with an interest in the Reintegration Programme comparable to that of Canada. I therefore note with particular satisfaction that you yourself, as Secretary General, will continue to press for universality of participation and speed in coming to the support of this programme.

5. As you are aware, any expenditure of public monies requires the approval of Parliament. When Parliament meets again in October I assure you that the question of a Canadian contribution to the Relief and Reintegration Programme will receive sympathetic examination. May I venture to add that the considerations outlined in my previous paragraph will undoubtedly weigh heavily with the Government of Canada in determining its decision in the matter.

6. Please accept, Sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

CONTRIBUTIONS FOR TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMMES

On June 12, 1950, Cabinet approved a contribution by Canada of $850,000 to the United Nations Expanded Programme for Technical Assistance for the first financial period of eighteen months ending December 31, 1951. At the same time Cabinet approved a contribution of $400,000 for the first twelve-month period of the operation of the Colombo Programme for Technical Co-operation, on the understanding that the greatest effort should be made to avoid duplication between the Colombo and the United Nations programmes and to coordinate the activities of the two programmes.

2. Canadian participation in both the technical assistance programmes is being co-ordinated by the new International Economic and Technical Co-operation Division in the Department of Trade and Commerce under Mr. R.G. Nik Cavell. This Division receives direction from the Interdepartmental Group on Technical Assistance on which the various Departments concerned are represented.

3. In order to plan Canadian participation in the Colombo Programme for Technical Co-operation beyond the end of the present fiscal year, it is necessary to have assurance now that a contribution for the next fiscal year will be included in the main estimates for next year.

4. The Secretary General of the United Nations has requested that the delegations of member states to the forthcoming General Assembly be prepared to pledge contributions for the year 1952 for the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme. The Economic and Social Council has expressed the opinion that in the light of the estimates for expenditure for the year 1952 it would be reasonable to ask Governments to contribute for the year 1952 amounts equal to or greater than the contributions which they made for the previous eighteen month period.

5. I therefore recommend:

(1) that the Canadian Delegation to the forthcoming General Assembly be authorized to pledge an amount up to $850,000 as the Canadian contribution to the United Nations programme for the year 1952. The extent of the Canadian contribution should depend on the amounts which other countries are pledging and on whether the Delegation is fully satisfied with the nature of the United Nations Expanded Technical Assistance Programme for 1952;

(2) that approval be given in principle to a second contribution of $400,000 towards the operation of the Colombo Programme for Technical Co-operation, this amount to be inserted in the main estimates for the fiscal year 1952-53.[48]

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION TO THE UNITED NATIONS INTERNATIONAL CHILDREN'S EMERGENCY FUND

I had not intended to bring this proposed contribution before Cabinet at the present time. However, I am informed by the Minister of Fisheries that the Fisheries Prices Support Board is anxious to dispose of a balance of 27,000 quintals of Labrador fish.

2. An enquiry of UNICEF indicates that that agency can dispose of 460 short tons immediately for Yugoslavia and/or Greece and possibly 340 additional short tons at a later date (a total of 800 tons, or approximately 14,286 quintals). UNICEF hopes to be able to arrange shipping on April 17 for 460 tons if the gift is approved. The 460 tons have a cost under the price guarantee of approximately $120,000, dried, packed, and ready for shipping f.a.s. dockside St. John's. The further 340 tons would cost approximately $90,000, or a total of $210,000.

3. Under these circumstances I think it may perhaps be wise to consider, in conjunction with the gift of fish, what other gift in cash the Canadian Government might appropriately make to UNICEF during the current fiscal year.

4. The General Assembly, at its Fifth Session, decided to extend the life of UNICEF for a further three-year period. Although there is to be an increasing shift of emphasis in the activities of the Fund towards technical assistance to national governments to help them develop and maintain their own programmes of child welfare, there remains a need for supplies of foodstuffs to carry out supplementary feeding programmes in certain areas.

5. The most recent Canadian Government contribution to UNICEF was in April 1950, when dried fish to the value of $600,000 ($546,000 U.S.) was donated to the Fund.

6. During the calendar year 1950 a total of $4,171,000 was given by a total of thirty countries, excluding the United States. Major contributions were as follows:

	U.S.
Australia	560,000
Canada	546,000
Germany	120,000
Japan	150,000
Thailand	313,000

The United States, during the same year, contributed the sum of $4,754,000.

Since the beginning of the calendar year 1951 contributions have been made by the following countries:

	U.S.
France	500,000
United Kingdom	280,000
Yugoslavia	200,000

Moreover, the Supplementary Relief Bill recently submitted to the United States Congress includes an item of $12.5 million for UNICEF. This amount has been cut to $5 million by the House, but may later be restored by the Senate to the original figure. The Bill provides for the funds to be used on the same matching basis as the former United States contribution, namely, $72 (U.S.) for each $28 from other governments. It is possible that Congress will limit its appropriation to the total necessary to match other contributions received or guaranteed up to the date on which Congress approves the Bill. Since the authorization for a United States contribution expires at the end of their fiscal year, June 30, 1951, an immediate Canadian contribution will not only be useful in itself, but will probably ensure a matching contribution from the United States appropriation.

7. An appropriate Canadian Government contribution to UNICEF for 1951, both in terms of the proposed United States contribution and in relation to those of other countries, might be $500,000.

Recommendation

8. It is recommended that Parliamentary approval be sought in the Supplementary Estimates for 1951-52 for a Canadian Government contribution to UNICEF of $500,000, this amount to include a maximum of $210,000 for the purchase of Labrador fish.[49]

CONVENTION DES NATIONS UNIES SUR LE STATUT DES RÉFUGIÉS ET DES APATRIDES UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION ON REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

261. PCO

Note du secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures pour le Cabinet

Memorandum from Secretary of State for External Affairs to Cabinet

Restricted

On July 18, 1950, Cabinet authorized the Canadian Delegation to the Economic and Social Council to support, in general terms, the United Nations draft Convention on Refugees and the Protocol on Stateless Persons. Since that time, the Convention and the Protocol have been examined further by both the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly. At its Fifth Session, the General Assembly decided to convene a Conference of Plenipotentiaries to complete the drafting of and to sign both the Convention and the Protocol. This Conference will take place in Geneva commencing on July 2 and it is the purpose of this memorandum to seek Cabinet approval of Canadian participation in the Conference including the signing of the resultant Convention and Protocol on behalf of the Canadian Government.

2. The purpose of the Convention is to guarantee to refugees the enjoyment of fundamental rights and freedoms without discrimination. The Protocol on Stateless Persons extends these rights to persons who are stateless, but who are not refugees.

3. The Convention, as it is drafted at the present time, has been examined carefully by the competent officials of my Department and of the Departments of Citizenship and Immigration, of Labour, and of National Health and Welfare. As a result of this examination, it appears to be possible for Canada to sign and subsequently ratify the refugee convention and protocol without making any changes in Canadian law. As a United Nations project designed to assist refugees and stateless persons to overcome the handicaps which they have suffered as a result of their present status which, in most cases, was brought about through no fault of their own, I believe that Canada should, if at all possible, sign the Convention and Protocol. This would be further evidence of Canada's support of the worthwhile humanitarian activities being carried out by the United Nations.

4. There are certain articles in the Convention which deal with public education, public relief, and social security. As these subjects are primarily the concern of the provinces of Canada, it is, of course, essential that the Convention include a federal state clause before Canada could sign it. This matter will be under discussion at the July Conference.

5. The Convention includes a clause concerning the expulsion of refugees which makes it mandatory that states shall not expel a refugee "save on grounds of national security or public order". Because of the provisions of Sections 40 and 41 of the Immigration Act which provide for deportation of any person other than a Canadian citizen, or person having Canadian domicile, on a number of grounds, and a similar mandatory provision in the Narcotics and Drugs Act, it is believed that the Canadian Representative may have to make a reservation on this article at the time he signs the Convention unless the wording has been changed, or there is a clear understanding that "national security or public order" includes all of the grounds on which refugees may be deported from Canada in accordance with Canadian law.

6. The present draft of the Convention includes a clause stating that it shall not apply to a person who is recognized by the competent authorities of the country in which he has taken residence as having the rights and obligations which are attached to possession of the nationality of that country. The Canadian Representative might endeavour to secure agreement on an interpretation of this clause that would exempt Canada's landed immigrants from the application of the Convention. Canada accords refugees who come here for permanent residence the great majority of civic rights which are enjoyed by citizens and other residents. It would be desirable but not essential to have this agreement as, in any event, the signing of the Convention and Protocol would not necessitate any change in Canadian law or practice.

7. It is recommended therefore:

(a) That a Canadian Representative attend the Conference of Plenipotentiaries and be given authority to sign the Convention and the Protocol on behalf of the Canadian Government.

(b) That the Convention should not be signed unless it contains a satisfactory federal state clause.

(c) That a reservation be entered in respect to Article 27, para. 1, concerning the expulsion of refugees, unless the wording is clarified, or an understanding is reached that this will not affect Canadian law or practice.

(d) That the Canadian Representative endeavour to secure agreement on an interpretation of Article 1 (D) that would exempt Canada's landed immigrants from the application of the Convention.

(e) That the Canadian Representative should seek further instructions if any fundamental changes are made in the text of the Convention before it is opened for signature.

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE OF PLENIPOTENTIARIES ON THE STATUS OF REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

During its Fifth Session, the General Assembly decided to convene, in Geneva, a Conference of Plenipotentiaries to complete the drafting of and to sign both the convention relating to the status of refugees and the protocol relating to the status of stateless persons. This Conference will take place in Geneva commencing July 2. Mr. Leslie Chance, Head of the Consular Division, will be the Canadian representative and he will be assisted by an officer from the Canadian Permanent Delegation in Geneva.

2. The convention which this Conference will consider was drafted in the first instance by an ad hoc committee of the Economic and Social Council. This committee held its first session at Lake Success in January and February 1950 under the chairmanship of Mr. Chance. It held its second session in Geneva in August 1950 and reported to the Fifth Session of the General Assembly. The Economic and Social Council, at its summer session in 1950, only discussed the clause determining what categories of refugees would come under the scope of the convention. The General Assembly also discussed this definition clause and recommended a compromise definition for the consideration of the Conference. The other clauses of the convention were not considered by the Assembly.

3. The refugee convention was designed to guarantee to refugees the enjoyment of fundamental rights and freedoms without discrimination. The purpose of the protocol on stateless persons is to extend the rights covered by the convention to persons who are stateless, but who are not refugees. The draft convention, as it now stands, covers a considerable number of rights which will be extended to refugees by those countries which decide to adhere to it. There are general articles such as the one on discrimination which states that no contracting state shall discriminate against a refugee within its territory on account of his race, religion, or country of origin, or because he is a refugee. There are other more specific clauses which, in some cases, call upon contracting states to grant refugees similar rights to those given to their own nationals, and in other cases, rights similar to those given to other aliens. Examples of these rights are those concerning the acquisition of property and leases and other contracts relating to property; rights concerning the protection of industrial property such as inventions, industrial designs, trademarks and trade names; rights of association; the right of free access to the courts of law; and the right to engage in wage earning employment and self-employment. Contracting states are asked to grant refugees the same rationing privileges as nationals and to treat them not less favourably than aliens in matters pertaining to housing. There are other clauses dealing with such matters as public education, public relief, labour legislation and social security, freedom of movement, identity papers and travel documents.

4. The definition of refugee which the Assembly approved and which the Conference is free to accept, modify, or reject, represents a compromise reached by those countries which preferred a narrow category type definition and those which preferred a broad definition. Canada is in the latter category. In brief, the definition recommended by the Assembly, if adopted, would cover any person who, as a result of events occurring before January 1, 1951, is outside the country of his nationality or former habitual residence because of "well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, or political opinions" and who is unable, or unwilling, to return to or to accept the protection of his former government. Among those excluded are persons having the rights and obligations of citizens in their countries of residence; those benefitting from other United Nations Agencies such as the Palestine refugees; war criminals; and persons guilty of non-political offences or acts contrary to United Nations principles.

5. The Canadian Delegation to the 1950 summer session of ECOSOC, on instructions which were approved by Cabinet, gave its general approval to the convention as it was then drafted. It is essential, from Canada's point of view, that a federal state clause be included because of the provisions of Articles 17 to 19 concerning public education, public relief and social security, which are primarily provincial matters. The federal aspects of social security have, of course, been examined by the Department of National Health and Welfare and there would not appear to be any conflict between them and the provisions of the Convention.

1. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 26th, 1951, thought it would be inadvisable for Canada to accept in their present form, articles 26, 27 and 28 of the draft Convention on Refugees. CONFERENCE ON REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

Following for Chance from Acting Under-Secretary, Begins: Cabinet has approved Canadian participation in the Conference, but has not yet approved signature of the Convention and Protocol on behalf of the Canadian Government. You will be receiving further instructions, probably in one week's time, which might include proposing amendments to Articles 26, 27 and 28, or making reservations on them. Articles 26 and 28 are worrying us, particularly as a reservation cannot be made on Article 28 unless Article 36 is amended.

2. For the time being, you should not give any indication that Canada will sign the Convention. At the same time, you should of course make it clear that the Convention must include a federal state clause. We hope to send you some guidance on this point next week. We have been told that Warren, the United States Representative, will not have authority to sign the Convention and might propose that the signing of the Convention by any country be delayed until next January. This would be satisfactory from our point of view.

3. If any important changes to Articles 1, 26, 27 and 28 or 36 are contemplated by other delegations, we would like to know about them immediately.

CONFERENCE ON REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

Following for the Acting Under-Secretary from Chance, Begins: In view of your paragraph one I judged it wise to resist strong pressure to accept the chair. Denmark was, on my nomination, elected.

2. 26 countries have delegates. My impression is that most of them, including Austria and Germany, intend to sign. I learn that Warren has no authority to sign but I doubt that he could succeed in carrying out a proposal to delay signature until January.

3. I trust further instructions promised your telegram under reference may reach me soon as conference will be discussing article by article (in readiness ?). Some modification of Article 28 will undoubtedly be necessary. I hope, however, that you may shortly be able to tell me that the Cabinet will approve of the signing of the convention subject to amendment or reservation. Any turning back on our part now might create very unhappy situation. We have been regarded throughout as taking forward attitude, somewhat in contrast to that of the United States, concerning whose signature there has always been doubt and in consequence some little undercurrent of feeling among other delegations. It would in addition, in my opinion, weaken seriously the job of the High Commissioner for Refugees with whom I hope to have some discussion tomorrow.

4. It is yet too early to reply to your paragraph 3 though the United Kingdom has definite anxieties on Clause 28.

5. No delegate has submitted a draft federal clause. You are doubtless familiar with previous efforts of the secretariat in this connection. I am discussing draft with Robinson of Israel who is the expert. Ends.

As you know, at its meeting today, Cabinet will be considering again the United Nations Convention on Refugees and Stateless Persons. You will recall that Mr. Harris expressed some concern about several points in it at the last meeting.[51]

Colonel Fortier came to see me yesterday afternoon and on the basis of our discussion, we have drafted the attached telegram to Geneva which Colonel Fortier will be discussing with Mr. Harris, with a view to having it approved by Cabinet. A copy of my letter to Colonel Fortier is attached for your information.

2. Under Article 28 as at present worded, it appears that Canada would be undertaking an obligation not to expel a communist, for example, to a country which has declared the Communist party illegal or which has passed a statute similar to the Smith Act under which leading United States communists have recently been sentenced to imprisonment. Canada is not willing to undertake such an obligation. In order that the Convention should not grant rights to communists or to other persons who believe in the destruction of fundamental human rights and freedoms, you should press for an amendment of Article I, paragraph E, sub-paragraph (b), by adding after "Article 14, paragraph 2" the words "or Article 30".

3. On Article 27, paragraph 1, you should endeavour to secure clarification of the wording "national security or public order" or an understanding that this language will not affect Canadian law or practice.

4. You should endeavour to have the Convention amended in such a way that it will not apply to landed immigrants in Canada. This might be done by amending Article I, paragraph D.

5. We are not certain of the meaning of the word "penalties" in paragraph 1 of Article 26. If the word "penalties" includes deportation, we would probably have to make a reservation to this Article since, as you know, we do issue deportation orders on the ground of illegal entry when it is impossible for us to produce the security evidence which is the real basis for deportation.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], July 4, 1951

Dear Colonel Fortier,

Following our meeting of yesterday afternoon, we have prepared a draft telegram to Mr. Chance in Geneva, which, if you agree, might be submitted to Cabinet for its approval. This is attached.

2. The difficulty about deporting United States communists would, I think, be overcome if Article I(E) (b) were amended by the addition of the words "or Article 30" after the words "Article 14, paragraph 2". Article 30 of the Declaration of Human Rights is attached for your information.

3. Cases like that of de Bernonville would, I think, be covered by Article 6 of the Charter of the International Military Tribunal. A copy of this is attached for your information.

4. Our draft telegram suggests that the meaning of the word "penalties" in Article 26, paragraph 1, should be ascertained; presumably if this is meant to cover deportations we would have to make a reservation before signing the Convention. However, if Mr. Chance is not to be given authority by Cabinet to-day to sign the Convention, it would not seem to be necessary to give him more definite instructions on this point for the present.

5. I am sending a copy of this letter, together with a copy of the draft telegram to our Acting Minister and to Mr. Norman Robertson. I enclose an extra copy for your Minister.

6. I enclose a copy of telegram No. 60 of June 30 to Geneva giving Mr. Chance interim instructions, together with a copy of his reply (telegram No. 43 of July 3). You will note that Mr. Chance hopes that Cabinet will shortly give him authority to sign subject to amendment or reservation. Perhaps your Minister would wish to suggest to Cabinet that he be authorized in the light of developments at the Conference to give Mr. Chance authority to sign subject to necessary reservations.

Yours sincerely,

UNITED NATIONS; CONVENTION ON REFUGEES AND PROTOCOL ON STATELESS PERSONS

4. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 29th, 1951, read a draft telegram of instructions to the Canadian representative at the U.N. conference now taking place on refugees and stateless persons. These indicated that authority could not be given to sign the Convention in its present form and outlined the objections there were felt to be, particularly to articles 26, 27 and 28.

(Memorandum, Acting Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, with attached letter to the Deputy Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and draft telegram; July 4, 1951.)

A point to consider was that the Convention, if signed, would almost certainly give rise to misunderstanding as to its consequences. As it stood, the Convention was between the countries that were parties and did not confer any rights on individuals. There would, however, almost certainly be a general feeling that it did confer individual rights or, alternatively, that legislation should be passed giving parallel individual rights under domestic law.

5. The Prime Minister pointed out that there were currently four leading United States communists who had not turned up to begin serving sentences against them. It was conceivable that they could have taken refuge in Canada. The government could not place itself in a position where it would be obliged to allow such persons to remain in the country. In view of the improbability that modifications to the Convention could be secured at the present stage that would make it acceptable, it might be preferable to have the instructions to the delegate revised so as to set forth the objections to the present Convention without instructing him to press for amendments.

6. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, noted the report of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and agreed that the draft telegram of instructions to the Canadian delegate to the United Nations conference considering the Convention on Refugees and Protocol on Stateless Persons be revised along the lines indicated by the Prime Minister.

CONVENTION ON REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

Following for Chance, Begins: The matter has been further considered by the Cabinet. The Cabinet is not prepared to authorize signature of the Convention in its present form. It is also doubtful whether at this stage there is any likelihood that amendments could be secured that would put the Convention in a form that could be approved. In the circumstances, the Cabinet has directed that, in explaining the Canadian position, you should indicate the reasons why it is felt that the Convention in its present form is not acceptable to Canada without pressing for the amendments that would be necessary to make it so. If it develops that amendments are agreed on that would remove the embarrassments the Cabinet considers to be involved in the present Convention the question of signature could then be reconsidered.

2. The Cabinet considers that there is serious objection to the present wording of Article 28 [now 33(1)]. As it now stands, it appears that Canada would be undertaking not to expel a communist, for example, to a country which has declared the Communist party illegal or which has passed a statute similar to the Smith Act under which leading United States communists have recently been sentenced to imprisonment. Canada is not willing to undertake such an obligation. It is felt that the Convention should not grant rights to communists or to other persons who believe in the destruction of Fundamental human rights and freedoms. If there is any general agreement to this effect, the modification might be accomplished by an amendment of Article I, paragraph E, sub-paragraph (b) through the addition after "Article 14, paragraph 2" of the words "or Article 30".

3. Article 27, paragraph 1 is considered objectionable because of doubt as to the meaning of the words "national security or public order" and para 2 is considered objectionable because it gives a refugee the right to be represented in the hearing of his appeal against deportation. The Cabinet would wish to be sure before authorizing signature that this language would not affect Canadian law or practice.

4. The Cabinet considers that the Convention should not apply to landed immigrants in Canada. The view is that the Convention should apply only to persons who are refugees in the sense that they have not been accorded admission on a permanent basis to a country. Once a refugee has been granted landing in Canada with immigrant status, it is felt that he should be subject to the normal provisions concerning immigrants. The limitation could presumably be effected by amending Article I, paragraph D.

5. The Cabinet is uncertain as to the meaning of the word "penalties" in paragraph 1 of Article 26. If it includes deportation, the Cabinet does not consider the provision acceptable, since in Canada deportation orders are issued on the ground of illegal entry when it is impossible to produce the security evidence that is the real basis for deportation.

6. The above are the principal objections to the Convention, as it now stands, apart from those that have already been indicated to you. They are set forth for your guidance in any statement you may make but, as stated in paragraph 1, it is not desired that you should press for the specific amendments that are indicated. Ends.

TELEGRAM 47 Geneva, July 7, 1951

Following from Chance.

1. I trust that I may exercise discretion as to timing of any further general statements of Canadian position. I do not think that such is necessary or even desirable at this stage. Conference is already fully aware of our hesitation. It is now clear moreover that only five countries charged, namely, Austria, Belgium, Luxembourg, Norway and Denmark are here with power to sign.

2. Debating so far has indicated that convention bristles with difficulty for all countries. Problems cited your telegram are generally those of countries of final settlement. But countries of primary and secondary class also have serious difficulties.

3. Doubts of Cabinet on Articles 26, 27, 28 are certainly shared by some other countries, notably, the United Kingdom who will press strongly for amendments. I have some hopes that the final text of these Articles may prove acceptable to Canada.

4. Proposition of your paragraph 4 is more delicate. Great numbers of refugees have been admitted to some European countries, notably, France, on a permanent basis. There is obviously danger of playing into hands of those who would wish to see present conference fail and then put the blame on the door step of immigrating countries like United States, Australia and ourselves.

5. I judge attitude of Cabinet to be that convention is not particularly important from the Canadian standpoint. They might even prefer not to become party to any convention of this nature. Nevertheless as a further indication of Canada's contribution to general humanitarian work of United Nations they would be prepared to consider signature if objectionable aspect of text can be removed in discussions.

6. If line expressed in 4 above is right I shall without any great vigour seek either on my own initiative or in collaboration with others to secure amendments which would remove embarrassment. If such amendments do not meet with acceptance I shall not press them unduly but will make a further and more specific statement of Canadian position if instrument is opened for signature at close of conference. I am now beginning to doubt last contingency.

7. I should be grateful for short telegram indicating whether or not I have gauged the Cabinet position and interpreted my instructions correctly.

CONVENTION ON REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS

Following for Chance, Begins: You may use your discretion as to the timing of any general statement on Canada's position.

2. Your judgment of Cabinet's attitude as expressed in your para. 5 is correct to a degree. Cabinet is not prepared to accept the restrictions on its freedom of action which would be imposed by the present Convention. From Canada's point of view, because permanent landings are granted to immigrant refugees, the majority of refugees in Canada would not receive any substantial additional benefits. At the same time, the Government would be restricted in its freedom of action on the specific points already mentioned. Therefore, Cabinet would prefer that Canada not become a party to a convention of this nature, but they are prepared to reconsider the convention later if the changes to meet their objections are incorporated in it.

3. Cabinet would not wish you to take any initiative in attempting to secure such amendments as long as our position is made clear. The initiative should be left to other members. Therefore, you should not take even the limited initiative outlined in your para. 6. Of course, if our views are sought there would be no objection to your offering appropriate explanations. Ends.

Rapport du chef de la Direction des Affaires consulaires

Report by Head, Consular Division

SECRET [Ottawa], September 20, 1951

REPORT OF CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE TO CONFERENCE OF PLENIPOTENTIARIES ON THE STATUS OF REFUGEES AND STATELESS PERSONS HELD AT GENEVA JULY 2-25, 1951

General

1. The Conference assembled at the Palais des Nations on the morning of July 2, 1951. In all, 26 states were represented (See Annex I†). The Conference was scheduled to complete its business by July 20, 1951. It had before it a draft Convention on the Status of Refugees and a draft Protocol relating to the Status of Stateless Persons. These draft instruments had been the subject of some eighteen months of study. They had been originally prepared by an ad hoc Committee set up under the auspices of the Economic and Social Council, which sat at Lake Success for five weeks in January and February, 1950. The drafts had subsequently been considered and revised by the Economic and Social Council, by a second session of the ad hoc Committee and by the General Assembly. The Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly had, however, considered little more than the definition, Article I.

2. The time allotted to the Conference of Plenipotentiaries seemed at the outset ample. It early became apparent, however, that the Conference was less one of plenipotentiaries in the usually accepted sense than a further meeting of experts — an enlarged ad hoc committee. It was apparent too that radical changes would be made in the text. In the end the Conference did not finish its work until the night of July 25, 1951.

3. The Conference rejected the Protocol on the Status of Stateless Persons on the ground that it was premature, that the whole question of the study of the status of stateless persons was still under consideration by the International Law Commission, and that if action were later to be taken it should be as the result of deeper examination by a Conference set up especially for the purpose.

4. On July 28, 1951, at Geneva, twelve states (see Annex II†) signed a Convention on the Status of Refugees (see Annex III†). The instrument will remain open for signature at the Headquarters of the United Nations until December 31, 1952.

5. The position of the Canadian Representative to this Conference was a little embarrassing. As Chairman of the ad hoc committee which had drafted the instruments under consideration by the Conference he had taken a somewhat prominent part. In subsequent discussions other Canadian representatives had played equally active roles. On his arrival in Geneva on July 1, 1951, he received written instructions which, subject to Cabinet approval, confirmed his previous understanding that the Government of Canada was favourably inclined towards signature of the Convention subject to some reservations. On the morning of July 2, 1951, however, he received telegraphic instructions which caused him to adopt a cautious attitude. A week later a further telegram stated that the Cabinet had certain specific objections to the Convention as it then stood but instructed him not to press for amendments.

The Objections of the Government of Canada

6. The objections of the Government of Canada as expressed in telegrams Nos. 60 of June 30, 1951 and No. 61 of July 5, 1951 centred principally about Articles 26, 27 and 28 of the original text. Further, the view was expressed that "landed immigrants" in Canada should be excluded from the terms of the Convention. It had, moreover, from the outset been understood that a convention which did not include an acceptable federal state clause (or article) could not receive Canadian signature or ratification, apart altogether from any other problems which the Convention might raise.

Article 26

7. The instructions of the Canadian Representative stated:

> "The Cabinet is uncertain as to the meaning of the word 'penalties' in paragraph 1 of Article 26. If it includes deportation, the Cabinet does not consider the provision acceptable, since in Canada deportation orders are issued on the ground of illegal entry when it is impossible to produce the security evidence that is the real basis for deportation."

8. Paragraph 1 of Article 26 appears in the final instrument as Paragraph 1 of Article 31. It reads as follows:

> "The contracting states shall not impose penalties, on account of their illegal entry or presence, on refugees who, coming directly from a territory where their life or freedom was threatened in the sense of Article I, enter or are present in their territory without authorization, provided they present themselves without delay to the authorities and show good cause for their illegal entry or presence."

9. In debate the Canadian Representative sought to obtain agreement with the proposition that a state by virtue of this article would not forfeit its right to expel refugees who had illegally entered its territory. The Representative of Belgium stated categorically:

> "that his Government could not interpret the first paragraph of Article 26 as restricting its right to send back a refugee who had entered Belgian territory illegally. The purpose of paragraph 1 was to prevent refugees from having to suffer penalties imposed for the unlawful crossing of boundaries provided they presented themselves of their own free will to the authorities and explained their case to them. The Government nevertheless retained its right to expel any alien who had entered its territory illegally."

The United Kingdom Representative endorsed the Belgian Representative's interpretation of Paragraph 1; he said:

"The right of asylum in his delegation's view was only a right belonging to the state to grant a refugee asylum, not a right belonging to the individual to insist upon its being extended to him. Article 26 therefore has nothing to do with the question of the right of asylum. The Belgian, Canadian and United Kingdom delegations interpreted the word 'penalties' in paragraph 1 as referring to penalties to be imposed by law on a charge of illegal entry and as being in no way concerned with the right of the state to grant a refugee asylum. He hoped that that view would be confirmed by the Conference; otherwise his Government might not be able to support the Article."

There was no dissent from this view.

10. Later in the debate on the Article the President of the Conference pointed out:

"that subject to whatever international conventions they had signed, states were sovereign as far as their own legislation was concerned. Article 26 only referred to cases of unlawful entry and provided for certain commitments in that connection on the part of states. If his interpretation of the Article was correct, delegations which had felt some concern about the scope of the objectives in the Article could rest assured the interests of the countries which they represented were safe-guarded."

11. While this declaration by the President is not conclusive it is only possible to report that there was no sign of disagreement with it. On the contrary it was clearly the consensus of the Conference that the interpretation of the Belgian, United Kingdom, and Canadian Representatives was correct. The Canadian Representative therefore concluded that he might with some assurance report that the word "penalties" as used in the Article does not include deportation on grounds of illegal entry. If, however, any doubt remains the position could perhaps be covered by a suitable statement at time of signature.

Article 27

12. Article 27 of the original text (Article 32 of the final instrument) deals with the expulsion of refugees lawfully in the territory of a contracting state. The instructions of the Canadian Representative stated:

"Article 27, paragraph 1 is considered objectionable because of doubt as to the meaning of the words 'national security or public order'. The Cabinet would wish to be sure before authorizing signature that this language would not affect Canadian law or practice. Paragraph 2 is considered objectionable because it gives a refugee the right to be represented in the hearing of his appeal against deportation."

Subject to correction by legal authorities it is suggested that the expression "public order" presents difficulties of interpretation in so-called common law countries which do not arise around the expression "ordre publique" in European countries. It is understood that this particular difficulty has been encountered on previous occasions. Even in Europe, however, there appears to be a good deal of elasticity in interpretation which undoubtedly varies somewhat from country to country. Canadian law and practice in this respect were fully exposed at the Conference and it was apparent that except for deportation of a refugee as defined by this Convention on the grounds of indigency alone, our law and practice would not be in conflict with this article. It would be presumptuous for a layman to pass an opinion as to whether Canadian signature of the Convention might involve any change in Canadian law. It may, however, be observed that many countries including the United Kingdom and the Scandinavian group have laws on their statute books which are similar to the Canadian law which permits deportation on the grounds of becoming a public charge. These countries, which have signed the Convention, stated through their representatives that they did not intend to change their laws. They merely proposed to refrain from invoking them against refugees.

13. As to paragraph 2 of Article 26, there was complete agreement that existing Canadian practice on deportation appeals was in full consonance with the terms of the Article. Consequently, no change would be necessary in that respect. However, other countries apprehended the same difficulty as did the Government of Canada regarding security evidence and the text of paragraph 2 of Article 31 of the final instrument provides for this situation. It now reads:

> "The expulsion of such a refugee shall be only in pursuance of a decision reached in accordance with due process of law. Except where reasons of national security otherwise require the refugee shall be allowed to submit evidence to clear himself and to appeal to and be represented for the purpose before the competent authority or a person or persons specially designated by the competent authority."

Article 28

14. Article 28 of the original text (Article 33 of the final instrument) prohibited the expulsion of a refugee to territories where his life or freedom was threatened. The instructions of the Canadian Representative stated:

> "The Cabinet considers that there is serious objection to the present wording of Article 28. As it now stands it appears that Canada would be undertaking not to expel a Communist, for example, to a country which has declared the Communist party illegal or which has passed a statute similar to the Smith Act under which leading United States Communists have recently been sentenced to imprisonment. Canada is not willing to undertake such an obligation. It is felt that the Convention should not grant rights to Communists or to other persons who believe in the destruction of fundamental human rights and freedoms. If there is any general agreement to this effect the modification might be accomplished by an amendment of Article 1, paragraph E, sub-paragraph (b) through the addition after 'Article 14, paragraph 2' of the words 'or Article 30'."

15. Debate at the Conference on this Article showed at once that almost every country shared the views of the Government of Canada in varying degrees. It was apparent that no unqualified obligation such as that imposed by the original text would be accepted. It was not, however, considered to be desirable to deal with the matter by reference to the Declaration of Human Rights in the Definition Article 1 but to face it squarely in Article 28. In consequence a paragraph was inserted which appears in the final instrument as paragraph 2 of Article 33 which reads as follows:

"The benefit of the present Article may not, however, be claimed by a refugee whom there are reasonable grounds for regarding as a danger to the security of the country in which he is, or who having been convicted by a final judgment on a particularly serious crime constitutes a danger to the community of that country."

16. The specific anxiety of the Government of Canada in this respect would appear to have been covered by the above provision since the decision as to whether an individual refugee in Canada did, in fact, constitute a "danger to the security of the country in which he is" would rest with Canada. If, however, legal opinion is in conflict with this view possible embarrassment arising from a fugitive United States Communist claiming the benefit of the Convention in Canada might be modified by Canadian adherence to the Convention only insofar as it would apply to refugees from Europe. This possibility is provided by the alternative which is discussed hereunder in paragraphs 26 et seq which deal with Article 1 — the Definition Article.

The Status of "Landed Immigrants"

17. The instructions to the Canadian Representative on this subject stated:

"The Cabinet considers that the Convention should not apply to landed immigrants in Canada. The view is that the Convention should apply only to persons who are refugees in the sense that they have not been accorded admission on a permanent basis to a country. Once a refugee has been granted landing in Canada with immigrant status it is felt that he should be subject to the normal provisions concerning immigrants. The limitation could presumably be effected by amending Article 1, paragraph (D)."

18. The view expressed by the preceding paragraph was put to the Conference in terms in which the undesirable psychological effects of making a special class of one particular group of immigrants was strongly emphasized. There was in the Conference a certain sympathy but no positive support for the proposal, and since the Canadian Representative was under instructions not to move for amendment the matter could not be carried any further. The suggestion that the situation could be met by amendment to Article 1, paragraph (D) received no support, it being pointed out that the paragraph had been inserted at the General Assembly to provide for the particular position of Volkesdeutches who had returned to Western Germany and under the law of that country had been granted national status.

19. This situation is illustrative of the undoubted difficulties of drafting an all-embracing convention which would cover in one instrument the diverse particular problems of countries of primary asylum and ultimate resettlement, and of unitary and federal states possessing a wide variety of legal concepts and practices.

20. In any event it is only possible here to report that though the views of the Government of Canada were strongly put to the Conference, they were not accepted and the final instrument does not make any provision for them.

The Federal State Clause: Article 41 of the Final Instrument

21. By telegram No. 64 of July 14, 1951 the Canadian Representative received the text of a draft federal state clause which had been prepared by the Department of Justice. This was clearly the first choice for the wording of such a text. He was, however, not initially to propose it but might show it to interested federal states who might support it. An alternative text based on a United States proposal for the Convention on Prostitution might be supported if it were put forward. The Canadian Representative might further support a proposal of the United Kingdom for a clause which would obligate federal states to report, upon request, the state of their law and the implementation of the convention with regard to any particular Article.

22. There were represented at the Conference a number of federal states (Austria, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Germany, Switzerland, United States of America, Yugoslavia). Discussion in the lobbies, however, developed the fact that of these only Australia, United States of America and Canada had much interest. The rest of the federal states were disinterested because under their constitutions the conduct of foreign affairs is vested in the federal authorities. The instructions of the Australian, United States and Canadian representatives were identical in one respect; they might support a federal state article but were not to initiate any particular text.

23. Such was the situation when the President of the Conference reminded federal states of the necessity of filing proposals with the Secretariat within forty-eight hours. Discussion between Australian, United States and Canadian Representatives developed that agreement could most probably be reached on the United States text previously mentioned with the insertion of the words "legislative" to meet the particular Canadian constitutional position. Accordingly, all three delegations asked by telegram for authority to co-sponsor such a text. In due course all received affirmative replies. Unfortunately, none did so in time for the calling of the item on the agenda. In the event the Representative of Israel proposed the same text as that which had been telegraphed to the three governments; he encountered immediate objection from the Representative of France who spoke strongly on the inequalities of obligation assumed by unitary and federal states. The Representative of Denmark proposed that constituent states, provinces, cantons, etc., should enter into the convention as sovereign in respect of those articles which lie within their legislative authority. The Canadian Representative supported the Israeli proposal intimating at the same time that it was not necessarily the first choice of the Canadian delegation. The United Kingdom Representative supported the insertion of a federal article, but was unhappy about the drafting. He proposed as an amendment that the reporting clause already mentioned should be added to the draft. He had previously been privately shown the Canadian Department of Justice draft which he preferred and in the course of his remarks he suggested that the Canadian Representative might read it for the information of the Conference. The latter did so, and later the Department of Justice draft was circulated as a possible suggested alternative.

24. After some debate in which the United Kingdom Representative supported the Department of Justice draft, the Israeli Representative withdrew his proposal and the President asked if, in the circumstances, the Canadian Representative would sponsor the Department of Justice text. Feeling that he had fulfilled his instructions by not initiating the text, the Canadian Representative agreed. The proposal carried: in favour: 12; against: 2; abstentions: 7, but at the second reading it was adopted by 19 votes to one with only 4 abstentions.

25. It will be noted that as finally approved paragraph (b) of the Department of Justice draft was altered by inserting after the words "provinces or cantons" the following words "which are not under the constitutional systems of the federation bound to take legislative action." This was done to meet the particular position of the Austrian Representative who was anxious to insure that the text gave no colour of support to the idea that the constituent states or cantons of Austria had any authority in international affairs.

Article I — The Definition Article

26. As had been generally anticipated there was much debate on the definition article. It will be recalled that the General Assembly had removed from paragraph 1 (b) of the original text the words "in Europe" from the phrase "as the result of events occurring in Europe before 1 January 1951". This was done against French opposition at the General Assembly. Canada, however, had supported the deletion of the words. At Geneva France strove to re-instate the words "in Europe". In this they were supported by the United States, whose representative took the line that it is better to make haste slowly, to deal with a known problem, and to make provision for new ones as they arise.

27. As on previous occasions the case for the "universalists", was led by the United Kingdom Delegation which was supported somewhat nervously at the start, but more firmly as the debate progressed by the Scandinavian and Benelux groups. They had further the doubtful asset of Egyptian and Iraqi support and somewhat capricious assistance from Yugoslavia. On the French side, besides the United States of America, were the Latin-American countries represented by the Consuls of Venezuela, Colombia and Brazil, Italy which had throughout gone along generally with the French position, and Monaco. A vote which everyone wished to avoid would probably have resulted in a close defeat for the French-United States combination and conceivably might have meant French defection altogether.

28. After two days of debate in which the Canadian Representative took no part a compromise was evolved, by arrangement advanced by the Holy See, and unanimously approved. In short, as will be seen, from the final instrument, this compromise enables the contracting states to make a choice by which they may apply the Convention, either

(a) to refugees from Europe only, or

(b) to refugees from Europe and the rest of the world.

Conclusions

29. By telegram No. 62 dated July 10, 1951 the Canadian Representative was advised as follows:

> "Cabinet is not prepared to accept the restrictions on its freedom of action which would be imposed by the present Convention. From Canada's point of view because permanent landings are granted to immigrant refugees the majority of refugees in Canada would not receive any substantial additional benefits. At the same time the Government would be restricted in its freedom of action on the specific points already mentioned. Therefore, Cabinet would prefer that Canada not become a party to a Convention of this nature but are prepared to reconsider the Convention later if the changes to meet their objections are incorporated in it."

30. A parallel study paragraph by paragraph of the draft Convention as it was presented both to the Cabinet and the Conference against the instrument which was finally adopted will show that the latter exhibits many changes and a much more cautious attitude than the former. It may perhaps be thought that the changes incorporated in it have gone a long way to meet objections. It is proper, nevertheless, to observe that the difficulties about "landed immigrants" and deportation on the grounds of indigency alone, have not been removed.

Recommendation

31. It is recommended that copies of the final instrument be distributed to interested Departments together with any extracts from this report which may be considered suitable. After an adequate period for consideration a study of the instrument might be undertaken by an inter-departmental group consisting possibly of Citizenship and Immigration, Justice, Labour, National Health and Welfare, Privy Council Office, and External Affairs with a view to concerting a submission to Cabinet for the signature of the Ministers concerned.[52]

Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

POLICY TO BE FOLLOWED IN THE CMC — COLLECTIVE MEASURES COMMITTEE

The attached memorandum examines some of the current activities of the CMC, in particular those relating to the role which the U.N. might play in a major war and to the peace time preparations for such a role. Difficulties have been encountered recently in instructing the Delegation as to the line to take in connection with the activities of the various sub-committees because these activities are advancing into a field in which no definitive Canadian policy has been enunciated. These difficulties have arisen particularly in connection with proposals to equip the U.N. with machinery specifically designed for possible action in time of war.

[52] Le Canada n'a signé la Convention sur le statut des réfugiés que le 4 juin 1969.
Canada did not sign the Convention on the Status of Refugees until June 4, 1969.

2. The memorandum examines three general positions which the Canadian Government might take. Of these, two may be regarded as extreme positions, and the third, which is considered the most desirable, represents a middle course between these two extremes.

3. The first position in essence is to accept the principle of converting the U.N. into a military alliance against the Cominform states; this would involve accepting the idea that the U.N. should provide or at least designate the central agency for the higher direction of a major war, and might result in the early withdrawal from the U.N. of the Soviet bloc. The second extreme position would consist in attempting to preserve the universal character of the U.N. in the hope that it might survive as a useful organization for the post bellum period; this position would rest on the assumption that the U.N. could avoid becoming actively identified with either side in the event of a world war. The middle course, as presented in the memorandum, involves the rejection of these two extreme views and assumes (a) that the U.N. is not the appropriate body to direct a major war and (b) that the U.N. could not remain neutral in the event of such a war.

4. In a positive sense, therefore, this middle course consists in preparing the U.N. to assist the Western Powers in the event of war through its moral backing and its facilities for encouraging and co-ordinating the support of those countries which might not take a full and active role in the war. At the same time an effort would be made to maintain as far as possible the universal and non-partisan nature of the U.N. on which its moral prestige rests.

5. It is recognized that this policy, generally desirable though it probably is, is somewhat broad and indefinite, but it is not considered possible at present to be more precise. Do you agree that we should attempt to follow this line in instructing the Delegation?[53]

[53] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
I think that we must start from the assumption that any war in which we are engaged will be one against an aggressor, and in accordance with our obligations under U.N. I don't see, then, how we can distinguish between the responsibility of U.N., as such, and the 'Western Powers' in such a war. Surely we must hope that U.N. will therefore be as active, at least, in such a war as it is in Korea to-day. Subject to this, I agree with course 3 — as a general guide — but not as a course which recognizes in advance that some members of U.N. have less responsibility in war and fewer obligations than others. Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Secretary of State for External Affairs

SECRET [Ottawa], August 22, 1951

ROLE OF THE UNITED NATIONS IN A GENERAL WAR

The present stage of work in the various subordinate groups of the Collective Measures Committee seems to raise, as a matter of some urgency, the question of the general position we should adopt towards the role of the United Nations in the event of a general war. In particular, the activities of the Collective Measures Committee appear to make essential some clarification of our thinking regarding the respective roles of NATO and the United Nations, both in the military conduct of such a war, and in the actual direction of economic warfare measures against an aggressor.

2. In the various fields covered by the CMC, the most rapid progress has been made by the Sub-Committee on Economic and Financial Measures which has now submitted its report to the full Committee. This report is drafted in such general language that it lends itself to several different interpretations regarding the role to be assumed by the U.N. in co-ordinating economic sanctions against an aggressor. Generally speaking the report is useful as a study in the field of economic warfare. It also describes possible measures of assistance to a state suffering from aggression, and offers a number of "guiding principles" and recommendations for consideration by the General Assembly or the Security Council in the application of economic sanctions. However, on the fundamental point of the degree to which the U.N. should assume operational responsibility for applying such measures, the report is by no means clear. One of the "guiding principles" reads as follows: "In the application of economic and financial measures under the auspices of the United Nations there is a wide area in which the United Nations should assume responsibility for co-ordination, for which purpose an appropriate body should be established." Again, one of the recommendations of the sub-committee reads as follows: "In the event that the Security Council or the General Assembly decides upon or recommends the application of collective measures against an offending state, a committee (should) be designated ad hoc for the necessary co-ordination of the measures."

3. The recommendations quoted above seem to be open to the interpretation that the U.N. should set up machinery and exercise control over the implementation of economic measures by member states which are actually at war. If this is the correct interpretation, such a procedure might conflict with procedure under NATO. If, on the other hand, the correct interpretation is that the U.N. should co-ordinate economic measures by those states which are not participating in military measures, such a principle would seem to be quite unobjectionable, and also practicable within the framework of the United Nations. This interpretation would, however, probably require some modification of the wording of the "guiding principle" quoted above. The debate which has now been begun in the CMC itself will no doubt clear up the question of which of these two interpretations is the correct one. Nevertheless, it is already quite apparent that this report of the Economic Sub-Committee raises, inferentially at least, an important problem of policy.

4. On the military side, the problem of the participation of the U.N. in a general war is also raised implicitly by the question of the directive which should be given to the Panel of Military Experts. There is a genuine danger that, if too broad a directive for this Panel is drawn up, the latter may become an agency through which the U.N. is drawn into such fields as operational planning and the standardization of military equipment, which would appear to be quite outside its proper sphere. Also in this field, the CMC has, under United States leadership, set up a Sub-Committee on Military Measures, which has now agreed on an agenda including a study of the question of "initial" and "further" steps to be taken in preparing collective military measures. On the question of "initial" steps, the U.S. Delegation has produced a draft paper recommending that, on the decision of the General Assembly or the Security Council that collective measures should be undertaken, a State or group of States should be designated as "the executive military authority" for conducting the military operations. (The term "executive military authority" is apparently considered more appropriate than "Unified Command", although there is no explicit consideration given in the U.S. paper to the distinction between a general and a limited war.)

5. This U.S. working paper deals at some length with the relationship between the proposed "executive military authority" and the U.N. The paper makes clear that full responsibility for strategy and tactics would be in the hands of the executive military authority, but adds that "the Security Council or General Assembly should define United Nations objectives" and that "in the event of the failure of the executive military authority to carry out its responsibilities to the satisfaction of the United Nations, the Security Council or General Assembly should be in a position to revoke its authority". It is still too early to assess the proper importance of the proposal contained in this U.S. working paper. If it is merely intended as a device for assigning authority to NATO from the United Nations, in the event of general war, the proposal would seem to be quite unobjectionable. If, on the other hand, the intent of this paper is that the military conduct of the war by NATO (or by any alternative "executive military authority" which might be designated), should be subject to constant scrutiny and debate by a committee of the U.N., many important problems are obviously raised. The attached teletype WA-3096 of August 13† from our Embassy in Washington quotes Mr. Hickerson as saying that, in the U.S. view, the "entire responsibility for the operational conduct of such a general war" would be in the hands of NATO and that the U.N. would not be allowed to "get in the way". Despite this assurance, however, it is evident that the precise relationship between the "executive military authority" (e.g. NATO) and the U.N. will need very careful examination.

6. In view of the above, it seems evident that, in drafting instructions to our Delegation in New York on the economic and military aspects of CMC's work, we should proceed from some definite basic assumption as to the degree to which the U.N. should participate in a general war; and also concerning the degree to which public preparations for the U.N.'s wartime role should be carried out. Generally speaking, there would seem to be three possible alternative concepts:

(A) We might frankly accept the idea that the United Nations should be used as the basis for a military alliance against the Cominform states. This would involve accepting the principle that the U.N. should be the central agency for operational control in wartime. It would also, of course, mean a frank abandonment of the U.N.'s present pretentions to universality. If such a course is followed, the almost inevitable Soviet withdrawal from the organization might well be followed by the withdrawal of such "neutralist" states as India, Indonesia and Pakistan, with the consequent decline in the U.N.'s prestige in the Asian territories, where its influence is of great importance to us.

Moreover, it must be recognized that the constitution of the United Nations, and the distribution of voting strength, is such that it would inevitably be a very cumbrous and inefficient mechanism for securing strategic and operational decisions in wartime. Again, any attempt to give the U.N. a fully operational role in wartime would seem to require a very careful examination of Article 103 of the Charter which states that: "In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the Members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail." In other words, if the U.N. were turned into an anti-Cominform alliance, there would be a serious possibility of redundant and conflicting obligations for such states as Canada, on the one hand under NATO, and on the other hand under the U.N. For these various reasons, it seems that we should reject the idea of using the U.N. as the basis for an anti-Cominform military alliance.

(B) A more practicable alternative would seem to be acceptance on our part of the position that the U.N. and NATO have complementary roles to play in the event of a general war. Such a basic assumption would mean that we would accept the principle that the actual operational direction of activities against an aggressor would be in the hands of NATO, in the case of a general war originating in the NATO area, or, alternatively, in the case of a general war originating outside NATO territory, in the hands of some other executive authority established under the auspices of the U.N. This would mean that, while the U.N. would not concern itself with the actual direction of economic and military measures imposed by the states actively engaged in the war, it would be used as a mechanism for obtaining the greatest possible co-operation from member states which were not actually participating. (The attached message from Washington indicates that the United States Government now generally accept this basic assumption regarding the U.N.'s wartime role.)

If such a middle policy were adopted, it might still provide the main advantages to be hoped for by U.N. participation in a war against aggression, without frightening off the neutralist states whose moral (and, possibly, economic) support in such a war is obviously of great importance to us. The political advantages to the free world of obtaining the U.N.'s blessing for collective military action against aggression are obviously of the first importance. Moreover, by limiting the wartime role of the U.N. in this manner, we should be able to maintain the organization in a position where it would be able to resume its essential role of a peace-preserving agency, when the fighting ceases. Even in wartime it is most important to preserve some symbol of the world community and to take account of the post-war period.

If we accept the principle of limited U.N. participation, careful consideration will obviously have to be given of the degree to which the activities of the CMC should be continued and of the publicity which these activities should be given. Nevertheless, it seems desirable to continue some, at least, of these studies, even if the U.N.'s role is limited to securing the maximum support from states not directly participating in the war. Great care will obviously have to be taken to ensure that, in the continuation of these studies, projects are not adopted which have the effect of assigning to the U.N. any actual operational responsibility in a general war. On the other hand, it is quite possible that from these studies there might emerge, among other things, a more clear conception of the sanctions which the U.N. can employ in any remaining peripheral disputes which do not directly involve a head-on clash between the Soviet Union and the West. The continuation of studies of this nature would also not seem to afford any valid pretext for Soviet withdrawal from the U.N. Unless the activities of the CMC have the effect of causing the General Assembly to establish some bodies with direct military and economic operational responsibility in wartime, the U.S.S.R. cannot very well present a convincing case for leaving the organization, and it seems unlikely that they would do so.

(C) The last alternative position which might be considered is to try to keep the U.N. in "cold storage" if a general war breaks out, in the hope that the U.N. machinery would remain fully intact for the post-war period. It could be argued that participation by the U.N. — even somewhat indirect participation — would destroy the essential character of the organization as a peace-making body. Nevertheless, Article 1, which calls on the U.N. to take collective measures for the suppression of acts of aggression, cannot be ignored. Moreover, in view of the Korean experience and the adoption of the "Uniting for Peace" resolution, it seems quite unrealistic to expect the U.N. to remain on the sidelines in the event of a war. The Korean crisis has shown that the United States Government (and, probably, the United Kingdom) will go to the greatest possible lengths to secure U.N. sanction for any hostilities in which it engages. It now seems very unlikely indeed that the leading democracies would enter a general war without securing the U.N.'s moral support.

Moreover, if the U.N. were kept in "cold storage" during any future war, it would be very difficult to obtain public support for reviving the organization once the fighting had ceased. This would, no doubt, be particularly true so far as public opinion in the United States is concerned. It would not be easy to convince the public that an organization which had played a purely passive role during a general war was an organization with any real moral validity. In view of these reasons it appears unrealistic to expect the U.N. to be a complete "non-participator", if a war breaks out, attractive though such an ideal may be, from several standpoints.

7. From the above it seems that the only practicable course for us to follow is to accept the basic position outlined above in alternative (B). If this general position is accepted, we can then proceed to give more explicit instructions to our Delegation in New York regarding the stand they should take on the military and economic aspects of the CMC's work.

8. I would, therefore, appreciate your guidance as to whether alternative (B) is a correct reflection of our position on this matter; and whether we should instruct our Delegation in New York in accordance with this general position. Do you agree?

POLITIQUE SUR L'AIDE EXTÉRIEURE
EXTERNAL RELIEF AND ASSISTANCE POLICY

273. DEA/11856-40

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures
au sous-ministre des Finances

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Finance

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, January 29, 1951

Dear Dr. Clark:

I am enclosing a memorandum prepared in this Department on "Canadian Contributions to External Relief and Development". Our Department has been very conscious of the difficulties in deciding on the recommendations we should make to the Government in the new field of external relief and assistance. To call this a new activity may be an exaggeration since we have had five years of post war experience in international grants, loans, relief and free transfers of one kind or another in addition to our major efforts in this field during five years of war. Nevertheless, it is still a comparatively novel field and one which has at times been the source of some misunderstanding and misinterpretation between different departments of the Government.

We have had, I am convinced, a really tremendous record in this field. And it is this very record which, in a sense, creates special problems for us. Many countries — both those which are well-to-do and close to us, and those which are far from well-to-do and far away — have come to believe that we can be counted upon to contribute in a reasonable way to any worthy cause. In the post-war period, we did not build up slowly, as the United States have done to their present huge underwriting of international obligations, economic and military. In a sense, our role has been complementary to that of the United States. When they were not undertaking large obligations, at least in relation to their national wealth, we were; when they began to play their proper role, roughly from the beginning of the Marshall Plan in 1948 on, we were properly able to cut down sharply our efforts in order to restore our own strength.

By 1950 the picture had begun to change, largely owing to the fact that the size of the international problem to be met was growing at an alarmingly rapid pace. In the field of defence, points of view and orders of magnitude have been changing very quickly. Present Canadian plans call for very large outlays and overseas assistance of a military type will no doubt have to be increased substantially. Although NATO has turned out to be in some respects a more cumbersome body than we had hoped, it has the possibility of becoming, and I think is becoming, an orderly body from which we can get a clear and sensible picture of our defence responsibilities. Plans, objectives and resulting obligations are, I am satisfied, competently handled at all stages.

On the non-military external aid side, however, the picture at times seems to be just about the opposite. Almost every time anyone goes to an international meeting anywhere, he is likely to come back with a bill. Sometimes it is a small percentage of a large bill, sometimes a physical contribution is called for, at other times the nature and size of the obligation are indeterminate and woolly — we are to give what we feel like giving and, understandably enough, we seldom feel like giving anything away with the exception of the odd bothersome surplus. One theoretical result is that we are at times called upon to make a percentage contribution to some remote activity over which we have little control, and in which it may be hard to find a clear direct Canadian interest. On the other hand, we may pass up useful activities where, along with a few other countries, we might make a clear and constructive construction.

We would very much like to bring a good deal more order into this situation and develop a sound Canadian attitude. Accordingly, we have been putting together our thoughts on how the question of Canadian contributions to external relief and development could best be approached within the Government and within this Department. These thoughts are set out in the enclosed memorandum. No easy answer is offered as to exactly what we should or should not do, or what we should or should not contribute. The draft programme we have suggested is not designed to promote new expenditures. Rather it is an attempt to regularize and rationalize Canada's position in regard to external assistance. I hope that you will find yourself in general agreement with our suggested approach and I shall look forward to receiving your views.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS TO EXTERNAL RELIEF AND DEVELOPMENT

I. Canadian Contributions Past and Present

1. During and immediately after the Second World War Canada gained an enviable reputation amongst the other free countries of the world. Canada became a leader in mapping out postwar policies — in the establishment of UNRRA, the Bank and the Fund, the United Nations itself, FAO, ICAO, and other specialized agencies. Further, Canadian leadership in the field of international policy was strongly backed up in the field of international finance. In UNRRA, the Bank, and the Fund, an appropriate Canadian contribution was readily forthcoming, and Canadian reconstruction loans to the United Kingdom and other countries in 1946 far outstripped, on any basis of comparison, similar programmes in the United States or any other country.

2. Since 1946 the position has been rather different. While Canada's wealth and national income has gone on growing at an unprecedented rate the amount available for external aid has shrunk. The course of events is shown in a detailed table at the end of this memorandum. In summary, the table shows that Canadian contributions (credits and grants) to external relief, development and mutual aid during the past six fiscal years have been:

	Millions of Dollars
1945-46	$ 244.8*
1946-47	907.4
1947-48	523.0
1948-49	112.9
1949-50	126.9
1950-51	24.7
	$1939.7

* Note: in 1945-46 Canadian Mutual Aid amounted to $766.9 millions.

3. Canadian military commitments at home and abroad are now heavy and will become heavier. This means that external Aid for other purposes, known and unknown, will have to be scrutinized with special care. Moreover, experience in the past five years provides the basis for such scrutiny. The time seems ripe for a rather more orderly approach to the matter than has been possible in the past.

4. At the same time we must recognize that the successes of communism in Asia makes it necessary for us to act vigorously. The prevalent view among the underprivileged is that Technical Assistance and other programmes for the under-developed are too small to have much practical effect. If we are to create an impression, and what is more, if we are really to do what we profess, we must in some directions maintain and even increase our efforts and expenditures on external relief and development. This argument is obvious and would probably be generally accepted; the danger, however, is that although we accept it in principle, we will abandon it in practice. Because our budgets for military expenditure will rise, we will be disposed to cut down, or even cut out, our expenditures for economic and social programmes abroad. Because we will have increased need for technicians in the defence programme, we will be reluctant to spare good men for other countries. We, like the United States and United Kingdom, must be prepared to give some priority to the men, materials, and money needed for relief and development overseas.

II. Growing Requests in the United Nations and Elsewhere

5. Canada has contributed to a large number of very useful international programmes since the war. Some of these have been of an emergency relief character: IRO, UNICEF and Palestine Refugees. In addition, in various United Nations bodies, we have approved the expenditure of money on many special studies and special assistance programmes. Most of this money has been well spent considering all the circumstances; no apologies are due to anyone. We must go on using the United Nations for helping the less fortunate countries.

6. On the other hand we should recognize that there is increasing pressure from the under-developed countries to put up money through U.N. for their development. The Technical Assistance Programme may be considered as the transition between, on the one hand, money spent on research and special projects within the United Nations and its specialized agencies and, on the other hand, money for capital development. Technical Assistance lies half-way between. Once the bridge has been built it will be difficult not to cross it. In the Commonwealth programme, developed during 1950, capital assistance followed logically and only a few months after technical assistance. And capital assistance means big money.

7. So far the United States and ourselves and certain other countries have resisted demands for capital assistance through United Nations channels. We have said that the International Bank represented the most that could be done in this field. The Bank makes loans that really are loans — with a reasonable expectation of repayment. When one goes beyond this into the field of grants-in-aid or gifts we claim that the United Nations is not a proper body to administer the money (by which we mean that the under-developed countries could out-vote us). We may be able to maintain this position for a time, perhaps indefinitely. However, we would be wise to arm ourselves with a pretty clear and consistent policy because we are sure to be attacked on all sides and in a number of international forums.

8. In the United Nations, apart from the Bank and Fund, each country has one vote. The under-developed countries have an overwhelming majority. There is a danger that they may vote programmes in their own favour. Moreover they can and do play ball with each other in getting the contributing countries to put up the maximum amount of money for all assistance programmes. When a programme has been approved, a few contributing countries feel bound to accept it; these countries include the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and a very few others. Most other countries are not in a position to give very much, but it must be admitted that some countries in a position to help have not apparently felt bound to accept the decisions of the United Nations.

9. What policies are we following, or might we follow, on the United Nations front when over-ambitious programmes for international aid are put forward?

(a) At present we fight each project on an ad hoc basis, getting it into as reasonable shape as possible — and then we pay our share of the bill. This has been reasonably satisfactory in the past. There is a danger that it will not be satisfactory in the future as the programmes get more ambitious and more expensive.

(b) As an alternative we might simply become irresponsible like many of the other countries and refuse to pay our share of the agreed bill. Nobody really wants to see Canada in this position.

(c) Another possibility under consideration is that the United Nations should work out a new scale of contributions for use solely in connection with international assistance programmes. Under it the United States might pay something like 60% of the total instead of a little more than 30% under the ordinary United Nations assessments. If such a scale of contributions were adopted, and contributions were then made compulsory instead of voluntary, it would at least enable the virtuous countries to point the finger of scorn at the others which refused to pay up. However, there is not much hope of our getting a majority of countries in U.N. to accept the principle of compulsory contributions and without it the new scale of contributions is not much use. Moreover, if the system really worked, the under-developed countries could work it very effectively to their own advantage.

(d) Most recently, at the last Assembly of the United Nations, the Canadian Delegation agreed to the establishment of a Negotiating Committee which would do an arm-twisting job on possible contributors. We only accepted this suggestion after other proposals had failed. It may prove a useful device in getting others to give. However, it does not solve the basic question: how much should Canada give and in what directions?

III. Changing Canadian Attitudes: An International Community Chest

10. In the past Canadian authorities have considered each project on its merits as it arose in the United Nations or elsewhere. Looking back — and also looking forward — this procedure seems to suffer from three defects:

(a) We leave ourselves wide open to back-scratching and log-rolling amongst the under-developed countries. They can and do gang up on us. We, on the other hand, have no clear line of resistance, no logical place at which we dig in our heels and say No.

(b) We cannot use our contributions to best advantage, having in mind both the general worldwide interest and also any special Canadian interests. We cannot consider effectively either the right timing or the right placing of our contributions.

(c) We are liable to become committed positively to supporting a programme merely by beginning a negative argument. A grandiose scheme is put forward; our representatives oppose it by taking a moderate and sensible position; a general wrangle takes place; a compromise is reached, the compromise is far better than the original proposal partly, perhaps largely, as a result of Canadian intervention; — and then — bingo! — the Canadian taxpayer is asked to put up a million dollars.

11. Ideally the remedy for this situation is quite simple. The Canadian Government should work out an annual programme of funds available for all projects. This would go up for parliamentary approval along with the annual estimates. Within the total approved by Parliament there would be a certain limited amount of discretion allowed to the Government; while most money would be earmarked a certain modest amount would not be. Additional money would only be asked in any year in the face of a very grave and unpredictable situation; Korean relief is perhaps an example.

12. It is suggested above that each year's programme should include a modest amount that is not earmarked for any particular project. The proposal is that this amount would be put by Parliament at the disposal of the Government to meet needs that could not be foreseen when the programme was placed before Parliament but that had to be met before the next annual programme was presented. This proposal is certainly not one that will commend itself, without explanation, to the Government or to Parliament. Nevertheless, it is important. Two of the main purposes of the proposed arrangements are (i) to promote orderly and consolidated consideration of external aid proposals and (ii) to provide for emergencies. Neither of these will be achieved if there is no elasticity within each annual programme and if piecemeal consideration of additional items is still needed. The bulk of the programme would be earmarked; but a certain amount, small in relation to the total, would not be. Certain broad restrictions would, of course, be placed by Parliament on the use of this amount, but it would not be tied to a particular purpose.

13. In working out annual programmes over a period of years two sorts of decision would be needed: decisions regarding the total sum to be made available and decisions regarding the individual programmes. These decisions would, of course, be inter-related.

14. Decisions would have to be reached on the projects that should be met in full, the projects that should be met in part, and the projects in which Canada ought not to participate at all. In short, over a period of time, we would have to try to work out some system of priorities in our international aid programmes. Priorities would have to be based chiefly on the four following factors and decisions between them would have to be made by Ministers;

(a) General programmes in which all members of the United Nations should share according to some recognized scale — e.g. UNRRA, UNICEF and IRO.

(b) Items for which Canada had in the past incurred special commitments.

(c) Items for which Canada had special responsibility.

(d) Items under which Canadian political and commercial interests might be advanced by contributions.

15. Decisions on individual projects would also be influenced by the total to be made available each year. The sum would, presumably, bear some relationship to what seemed desirable (or even respectable) in the international world we live in. In short, a Canadian contribution to an International Community Chest would be under consideration. We would have to pay attention to the needs, to our own capacities, and to the behaviour of other contributing countries.

16. The four preceding paragraphs sketch an ideal system. It is neat and logical. Unfortunately it cannot work out quite so neatly and logically in practice. It is not certain how far the Government or Parliament will really accept the theory of an "International Community Chest". It is also not certain whether, granted this theory, the Government will be willing to ask Parliament to grant any elasticity within the total sum to be made available. However, despite these difficulties and disadvantages, it is submitted that the general policy outlined in the foregoing paragraphs is the one which should be pursued.

17. If this policy is adopted the position of Canadian representatives in international discussions will be greatly changed. The total available from Canada will be known to all in advance. If one under-developed group succeeds in getting larger amounts from Canada it will be at the expense of others; they will compete instead of gang up. Our representatives will not feel bound to fight each item separately — and get committed to contributions in the course of the battle.

18. It would help the Canadian Government, both in its relations with Parliament and its relations abroad, if other important "contributing" countries adopted the same sort of approach. The United States is feeling its way towards the policy or policies suggested above. The Gordon Gray Report suggests the overall rate at which United States external assistance should be provided and gives advice as to the division of the assistance. This Report comes pretty close to being the policy of the United States Administration. Last year, for the first time, U.S. foreign aid programmes were consolidated before they were presented to Congress; this year the same policy is being followed. If the Canadian Government decides to adopt the same line it may be desirable to explore the outlook with the United States authorities and also, perhaps, with the United Kingdom and Australian authorities.

19. One further word should be said about the risk of sliding into financial commitments. (See paragraph 10(c) above). This risk is not confined to financial questions. It arises in matters that appear at first sight to be purely political. An active foreign policy costs money, even if the policy is apparently confined to purely political affairs.

IV. The Programme for 1950/51

20. The basic programme for 1950/51 has been approved by Parliament. Cabinet may be asked to approve an additional item (further funds for Palestine Refugees). To date, therefore, the programme is as follows:

U.N. Technical Assistance	850,000
Commonwealth Technical Assistance	400,000
I.R.O.	2,100,000
Palestine Refugees	750,000
Palestine Refugees (Possible further contribution)	750,000
TOTAL	5,450,000

Cabinet has approved a further sum not to exceed $8,000,000 for Korean relief, but it is doubtful whether this will in fact be used.

V. Sketch of a Programme for 1951/52

21. The programme for the coming year might include the following items.

U.N. Technical Assistance	Uncertain
Commonwealth Technical Assistance	400,000
UNICEF	750,000
Palestine Refugees	1,250,000	(?)
IRO	2,000,000	(?)
Colombo Plan	Uncertain
Unallocated amount (say)	2,500,000

VI. Future Steps

22. If progress is to be made along the line suggested here other Departments concerned must be consulted. Most important is the Department of Finance. After consultation with that Department a more general consideration might take place in the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy.

23. After the necessary consideration by officials has taken place the whole question would have to be referred to Cabinet. It appears that approval should be sought for:

(a) The general programming approach involved in the concept of an International Community Chest (paragraphs 11—15 above).

(b) Consultation with other Governments in regard to the same approach (paragraph 18 above).

(c) Residual items in the programme for 1950/51 (paragraph 20 above).

(d) A programme for 1951/52 (paragraph 21—22 above).

Memorandum from Head, Economic Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

[Ottawa], June 16, 1951

COMMUNITY CHESTS — NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL

On January 29th you sent our memorandum on the International Community Chest to Dr. Clark. On April 25th I asked you whether you wished to follow the matter up, since we had not heard from the Department of Finance. You replied that we should give it about a month's hoist.

2. Mr. Reid and I had a talk with Mr. Bryce on this matter yesterday morning. Various points emerged:

(a) If we are going to get Canadian contributions to international assistance on a regular basis there may be something to be said for making that basis statutory. Therefore we might ask the Minister to consider the introduction of a bill into Parliament in 1952 providing for regular contributions. The most effective way of achieving this result would probably be to set up a "revolving fund". A certain amount of money would be set aside and the general purpose laid down in the legislation. Each year subsequently the Government would seek an annual vote to bring the fund back to its original value and at that time would explain and defend all expenditures made out of it in the interim.

(b) The Department of Finance (Messrs. Bryce and Pollock) are doubtful whether it is safe for the Canadian Government to set up such a national fund unless and until the United Nations itself sets up an international fund on a similar basis. They are afraid that if there is Canadian money "lying about" the pressures on the Government to make it available will be irresistible. There is some strength in this point although I personally would not want to make Canadian action dependent upon United Nations action in the parallel field. The danger of pressure on an international community chest held and administered by the United Nations might well be even more serious than the dangers to a national Canadian chest. These, however, are matters which may be explored further.

3. There is probably not much point, just at the beginning of the summer holiday season, in pushing the Department of Finance to a formal reply to our enquiry last January. The matter might well be taken up with them in September. Meanwhile we ourselves could make some progress along two lines, if you agree:

(a) Our representative at the Economic and Social Council this summer might discuss informally with the United States and United Kingdom representatives what their views are on the proposals we have in mind.[54]

(b) We might ask our Legal Division to make a rough draft of legislation designed to set up a Canadian international community chest on a revolving fund principle. Such a draft might be submitted to the Department of Finance when we approach them in September.[55] [56]

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTIONS TO EXTERNAL RELIEF AND DEVELOPMENT

You will recall that about this time last year, on your instructions, a memorandum was prepared on the subject of Canadian contributions to foreign aid programmes. The memorandum outlined the various international relief and economic assistance programmes to which Canada contributes, or is asked to contribute, and emphasized the difficulties and embarrassments arising out of the absence of a clear cut Canadian policy in respect of international assistance programmes. As one means of bringing about a more orderly method of dealing with this growing problem and in an attempt to rationalize Canada's position in regard to external aid, the memorandum suggested a "community chest" approach to the whole field of international relief and development. This would have entailed an annual parliamentary vote to cover all projects and to include a modest amount not earmarked for any particular purpose but to be used, at the Government's discretion, for unforeseen needs which might require immediate action.

(In subsequent discussion a rather different proposal was put forward: Parliament would pass permanent legislation to set up a fund from which the Government would make expenditures; and each year, when the fund had to be replenished, the Government would defend the expenditures it had made during the preceding year).

2. In late January of last year, I sent a copy of this memorandum to Dr. Clark and asked him for his views. We have had no reply from Clark and have refrained from pressing him, because of his pre-occupation with other matters and his illness in the early summer and because other officers of his Department expressed the opinion that, in view of the lack of enthusiasm exhibited in Cabinet for the Colombo Plan, it was doubtful whether the time was ripe for a more comprehensive proposal.

3. In view of the continuing heavy burden of defence expenditures for the coming fiscal year, I would doubt that this is an opportune time to raise in Cabinet the question of a general programme of foreign aid. My feeling is that the scheme should be set aside until a more favourable climate prevails.

4. A more modest proposal, which you may think worth considering, would be to try to group together in the estimates all the items for international relief and economic assistance and to add a small item to cover unforeseen emergency calls. What I have in mind is a small amount, say not less than $100,000 and not more than $500,000, which could be drawn upon, with the approval of Cabinet, for emergency relief needs which we might want to assist. It would be an additional item under "terminable services"; this vote should, I suggest, be put in the first supplementary estimates. The other items with which it would be associated are: Colombo Plan; the Colombo Technical Cooperation Programme; the U.N. Expanded Programme of Technical Assistance; UNICEF; Palestine Refugees; and Provisional Intergovernmental Committee for the Movement of Migrants from Europe. (The votes for the Colombo Technical Cooperation Programme and for PICME are at present included in the main estimates, but could be removed any time before the end of January and held for the first supplementary estimates).

5. If you think this idea has merit, I shall have a draft memorandum prepared for Cabinet, explaining the proposal for the small additional item with supporting evidence of the desirability of a readily available reserve fund of this kind.[57] The memorandum could illustrate the sort of situation envisaged, by reference to Greek relief, the earthquake in Ecuador, the Po River Valley flood, and the several requests received last year from the Secretary-General for emergency supplies for Korean refugees and civilians. (Do you think that "food for Yugoslavia" should also be used as an illustration?)[58]

REPLY TO THE I.L.O. MEMORANDUM ON "THE BEST FORM OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION TO FURTHER EUROPEAN MIGRATION"

1. In January 1951, the International Labour Office circulated a memorandum† in the form of a questionnaire requesting member governments to give "their considered views as to the best forms of international co-operation to further European migration in relation to world economic opportunities and manpower needs, with full appreciation of the financial and other implications of questions raised in this memorandum".

2. The Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Immigration felt that a formulation in general terms of Canadian policy was desirable before it attempted to answer the specific questions raised by the I.L.O. memorandum.

3. A general formulation of Canadian migration policy having been proposed by a sub-committee and approved by the committee, it became apparent that most questions were too complex to be dealt with in the framework of the I.L.O. questionnaire, and that detailed answers could only be provided if Canada were willing, — either to appear selfish and uncooperative by answering negatively or evasively,
— or to risk eventual embarrassment and financial commitment by taking a positive stand on semi-hypothetical proposals.

4. Moreover, it is understood the I.L.O. will be submitting shortly specific proposals for enlarged international action in the field of European migration, designed for discussion at the migration conference to be held under I.L.O. auspices in Naples, Italy, in October 1951.

5. The undersigned are of the opinion that there is no obligation to answer this type of questionnaire by specific replies to the questions as framed, and recommends that Canada's reply be limited to a general statement along the lines of the attached.

CANADIAN REPLY TO THE I.L.O. MEMORANDUM ON THE BEST FORM OF INTERNATIONAL CO-OPERATION TO FURTHER EUROPEAN MIGRATION

1. The Minister of Labour of Canada presents his compliments to the Director-General of the International Labour Office and has the honour to convey to him Canada's reply to the Memorandum on The Best Form of International Co-operation to Further European Migration.

2. Canada recognizes that mainly due to the war and its aftermath, there exists in several countries of Western Europe a problem of population surpluses created by large scale displacements of people, by the disruption of national economies, and by the interruption of normal emigration.

3. However, some of the pressure caused by refugees has been successfully relieved by the International Refugee Organization.

4. Canada has co-operated in efforts to provide both short term and continuing solutions to surplus population problems through reception and placement of large numbers of immigrants, and by participation in and contributions to existing international agencies.

5. As an immigration country, Canada is interested in continued immigration from Western Europe within the limits of the absorptive capacity of the Canadian economy as determined from time to time by the Canadian Government.

6. Canada is making sustained efforts to improve the nature and scope of its immigration services.

7. Canada recognizes the value of the technical and advisory services developed by existing international organizations, such as the development of arrangements for the systematic exchange of information; periodical enquiries into European manpower surpluses and into the needs of immigration countries; the development of international clearance procedures; the establishment of basic standards for occupational examination; the establishment of uniform standard descriptions regarding the qualifications of the various categories of workers; the promotion of the status and welfare of migrants; surveys of the causes, trends, and consequences of migration; and technical assistance in general including the loan facilities of the International Bank.

8. It is, however, difficult at this time to assess the full extent of the practical value of a number of the services which have been but recently developed or are still in process of development. Before lending support to the development of additional services, Canada would have to be convinced that the existing ones are insufficient to meet actual needs.

9. Canada does not consider the assumption of operational activities in the field of migration by an international agency to be imperative for Canadian purposes. However, this shall not preclude the further consideration of detailed plans which may be advanced later.

10. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that its reply to the questionnaire included in the I.L.O. Memorandum should be limited to the foregoing statement, and considers that any attempt to provide detailed answers would be premature. Many questions relate to activities of specific international organizations or agencies and it is considered that such questions can be more properly considered as they arise at meetings of each organization or agency. For instance, items relating to international financing of European emigration are on the agenda of the present Session of the Economic and Social Council. Other questions of a general nature concerning participation in international activities are not capable of intelligent discussion or reply except in relation to specific and concrete proposals. If such are made, Canada is willing to discuss them with the appropriate bodies, subject to certain basic reservations: for instance, Canada would not wish to consider any proposal which did not recognize the right of Canadian selection of immigrants in accord with Canadian standards.[1]

MIGRATION CONFERENCE CALLED BY THE INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANIZATION

The International Labour Organization has called a Conference, to open at Naples on October 2, to consider a plan which it has put forward for the establishment of an ILO Migration Administration.[2]

2. This plan has been carefully considered by the Inter-Departmental Advisory Committee on Immigration, in the light of:

(a) The approaching dissolution of the International Refugee Organization on December 31, 1951;

(b) The extent to which the Canadian Government might favour the continuance of all or part of IRO's work by some form of international body;

(c) The views of the United States Administration and Congress, which are crucial to the success of any international migration organization.

3. According to the best information which our Embassy in Washington has been able to obtain, the United States Administration, after studying the ILO proposals, considered that these needed substantial modification. However, as the Senate House Conference Committee has made the granting of up to $10 million to assist migration, contingent on its not being used by any organization which includes in its membership Communist-dominated nations (i.e., the ILO), the Administration's plans regarding the ILO proposals have had to be abandoned, at least for this year. The State Department does not therefore consider it possible for the United States Delegation at Naples to discuss the organization that should be established to deal with migration or to support the establishment of any organization. The United States Delegation may be able, however, to discuss the general nature of a long-term migration programme.

4. Therefore, since the United States Administration does not feel in a position to support the ILO proposals, and since the IRO will cease activities on December 31, 1951, the U.S. State Department considers it essential to establish an ad hoc interim organization to carry on operations during the coming year, and having as its members both immigration and emigration officials of other interested countries. The State Department expects that it will be necessary to call a special conference on this subject. This conference, which could arrange to take over the ships and other physical facilities at present operated by IRO, would probably take place in Washington some time in the latter part of November.

5. While the Committee considered that Canada, in relation to other overseas countries interested in European migration, was well equipped to handle immigration under bilateral agreements and without the assistance of an international agency, it nevertheless recognized that since shipping facilities might continue to present difficulties for some time ahead, Canada should be prepared to consider the proposal made by the U.S. Government to set up an ad hoc interim inter-governmental agency.

6. Accordingly, it is recommended that the Canadian Delegation to the ILO Migration Conference at Naples be issued with the following instructions:

(i) It should neither initiate nor support, in the first instance, any proposal for an international migration organization of an operational character;

(ii) It should stress:

(a) that so far as Canada's own immigration activities are concerned, Canada does not consider there is any need for a permanent international organization in the field of migration;

(b) that in any circumstances, and regardless of the nature of the organization, Canada will retain complete control in respect of selection, standards, and numbers of immigrants;

(iii) It should not support the ILO proposals, and should support any move which develops to have the ILO proposals deferred for future consideration.

(iv) Since the United States Delegation will not be able at this meeting to discuss the organization which should be established to deal with migration or to support the establishment of any organization, either long-term or short-term, but will be confined to discussing the general nature of a long-term migration programme, the Canadian Delegation should confine itself to joining in such general discussion as may develop. In this connection it should:

(a) emphasize the necessity for limiting the scope of any proposed operational activities in order to avoid duplication with those provided by existing organizations;

(b) oppose extension of the scope of the current technical assistance being offered by the ILO, pending greater opportunity for appraisal of these activities;

(c) examine the validity of ILO estimates of the annual European immigration movement and the capacity of interested immigration and emigration facilities, including assisted passage, so as to permit proper appraisal of any proposals to establish an international European migration agency.

(v) Since this conference will be followed on October 18 and 22 by the annual meeting of the IRO Executive Committee and General Council in Geneva, and some time in November by the proposed Washington Conference, the Canadian Delegation should examine any recommendations that may be made by the Naples Conference in the light of their possible effect on the two succeeding conferences.

(vi) In the event that alternative proposals to the ILO plan are put forward, the Canadian Delegation should examine them in the light of the foregoing principles and refer to Canada for further instructions if a point is reached where a decision has to be taken on the merits of any particular plan.[3]

DESPATCH 440 [Geneva], October 25, 1951

ILO MIGRATION CONFERENCE, NAPLES

In my letters to Mr. Heeney dated October 3rd,† 8th,† 10th,† and 15th,† I attempted to describe proceedings at the Migration Conference, convened by the International Labour Organization, which was held in Naples, Italy, from October 2nd to 16th. There is perhaps not much of interest to be added to those informal accounts, but it may be useful if I record in one despatch the main facts concerning the Conference, my observations with respect to the proceedings, and the results of our deliberations.

2. It will be recalled that the Preliminary Migration Conference held in Geneva from April 25th to May 9th, 1950, recommended in its general resolution that the I.L.O. should:

(1) suggest the best form of co-operation on the international level with a view to the achievement of the aims set forth in the resolution; and

(2) draw up, after consultation with the Governments concerned, appropriate proposals for submission to them at a subsequent meeting.

3. The proposals which the I.L.O. submitted to the Naples conference included plans for an elaborate Migration Administration to be directed by a Migration Administrator who would report to the Director-General of I.L.O. It is, of course, an arguable point, but my own impression is that this project was hardly justified in view of the replies from Governments to the I.L.O. questionnaire; and in fact, at least the early drafts of the proposals were prepared long before replies from Governments had been received. The recommendation of the Preliminary Migration Conference, therefore, that the I.L.O. draw up its proposals "after consultation with the Governments concerned" was apparently not taken too seriously by the Secretariat, and as a result it is questionable whether the proposals submitted to the Naples Conference were in reality "appropriate".

[3] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 26 septembre 1951./Approved by Cabinet, September 26, 1951.

4. However, it may be wrong to criticize the Secretariat for having been imaginative; and it would be a harsh accusation to suggest ambitions for empire-building — though certainly whispers to that effect have been current. The sincerity of the Secretariat, and its reliability as an international civil service, was tested after rather than prior to the opening of the Conference, for it became clear during the early meetings that the I.L.O. proposals had no chance of success. At that stage honest civil servants and sincere humanitarians should have abandoned unrealistic ideals and co-operated with the representatives of Governments to seek other solutions for the problems of European surplus population. The I.L.O. Secretariat, however, or more specifically, Mr. Jef Rens, Assistant Director-General and senior official at the Conference, and Mr. C.W. Hepler, Chief of the Manpower Division, did not meet these tests: rather, after some minor and ineffectual scheming, they relapsed into sulks broken by occasional shows of thinly disguised temper.

5. It was the United States which struck the first blow to the I.L.O. aspirations by stating that they were not at this time prepared to discuss the establishment of an international operational agency in the migration field. Australia also shared this view, although they indicated that they would be prepared to consider closer intergovernmental co-operation along more modest and more practical lines than envisaged by the I.L.O. Argentina expressed itself as against any international migration organization or any expansion of migration activities of existing agencies, and Venezuela stated that they did not agree with the conclusions of the I.L.O. that a new international agency was necessary. The Canadian Delegation joined its voice to others which felt that the need for international operational machinery had not been established, and the Canadian position was summarized in the following words by the Head of our delegation at the conclusion of a statement made to a plenary session of the Conference:

> "Although we are not able to accept the specific proposals put forward by the I.L.O., we shall continue to give sympathetic consideration to the migration problems of other countries and to co-operate willingly in seeking solutions for those problems which can be clearly demonstrated to us."

6. This was a formidable expression of opinion on the part of immigration countries against the I.L.O. proposals, and it was obvious that plans for a Migration Administration could not succeed. Yet the United Kingdom persisted in urging, and was virtually alone in so doing, that the I.L.O. proposals should be considered in detail by the Conference. Of course, as I explained in earlier letters to Mr. Heeney, this was largely the Ministry of Labour viewpoint, apparently not shared by the Foreign Office and Treasury Officers on the United Kingdom Delegation who believed that the Labour people had acted much too independently and had not invited adequate consultation on a sufficiently high level before drawing up their own instructions for the Naples Conference.

7. The French Delegation studiously avoided all reference to the main problems during the early stages of the Conference, and in a statement during the general debate in plenary they dealt only with conditions in France with nary a reference to the I.L.O. Subsequently, however, no doubt influenced by implications of support for a modest form of inter-governmental body, the French, with support from the Belgians and Italians, became the main proponents of what eventually emerged as a proposal for the establishment of a Consultative Council on European Migration. With no lack of modesty the French reminded the Conference of their efforts to achieve this concrete proposal and of the "concessions" on their part which it implied; and although they could not accept the I.L.O. plans for a Migration Administration, they deplored the criticism of I.L.O. which had been expressed by others. In point of fact, no one else had said any more than the French at that moment admitted, i.e. that the I.L.O. proposals were unacceptable; and there was a smack of hypocrisy in the French position which many delegations, including our own, found unpalatable.

8. This impression was not dissipated by a statement delivered towards the end of the Conference by Mr. Ramadier, French chairman of the Governing Body, who pointed a finger at the United States by saying it was that country which had urged I.L.O. not to go on making conventions, but to take action; and as a result of that injunction, Mr. Ramadier added, the Director-General produced proposals for action in the migration field "and immediately doubts were expressed by those very people" who had called for action. I am given to understand that Ramadier's references to the United States were even more rude in an earlier text, but he had been persuaded to tone them down. Yet this was the man who sat in the French chair at the budget session of the Governing Body and took the lead in insisting that the Director-General pare his budget estimates to the bone.

9. Another significant statement made towards the end of the Conference was that of Mr. Rens, Assistant Director-General, who replied to the general discussion, and took that opportunity for a rather petulant apology for the I.L.O. proposals. Mr. Rens said, "What threatens the plans of the International Labour Office is not constitutional objections or technical objections. It is for reasons on which I will refrain from commenting that attempts have been made in some quarters to restrict our activities."

10. In other words, the Secretariat clearly adopted a "bloody but unbowed" attitude which was of no assistance to the Conference, and which, by lowering the prestige of the individuals concerned, was a disservice to the organization which they represented.

11. The only other group opinion which I need mention was that of representatives of organized labour, namely the workers' members of the Governing Body, and the spokesmen for the International Confederations of Christian Trade Unions and of Free Trade Unions. From those speakers we heard pleas for action, and not being satisfied with the work of the Conference the representative of the Free Trade Unions threatened in a burst of oratory that if the Governments did not act, the workers would act themselves. There was no mention, however, of the part which organized labour has played in restricting the numbers of persons admitted to countries of immigration, a fact which has influenced some governments to approach migration problems with caution.

12. Such was the temper of the Conference. What emerged, despite the confused background, were reports† of two committees, one on medical selection of migrants and one on programme. With certain reservations these reports and the draft resolutions attached thereto were adopted by the Conference. Copies of these reports were forwarded with earlier letters but to provide a complete record I shall attach to this despatch three additional copies of each report.

13. The committee on medical selection sought to establish basic principles and criteria for medical examination of migrants. Resolution No. 1 attached to the report of that committee sets out general principles and criteria for examination, and the resolution was adopted unanimously subject to a reservation of Canada with respect to paragraph 13: Canada could not accept the provision that medical files of rejected candidates should be returned to the medical authorities of the countries of emigration.

14. Resolutions 2, 3 and 4 were adopted without reservations. No. 2 recommends studies aimed at the adoption of more detailed uniform criteria. No. 3 recommends that groups of experts study the problem of medical criteria for migrants seeking employment which requires special physical ability. The final resolution, No. 4, recommends that committees of experts study the difficulties with respect to applying the general principles outlined in resolution No. 1 when candidates suffer from certain diseases such as tuberculosis, venereal disease or trachoma.

15. The most important resolution to emerge from the programme committee is that attached as annex 1 to the committee's report. The operative part of that resolution recommends "the establishment of a Consultative Council on European Migration for such period as may be necessary to consider questions of policy in connection with migration from Europe." The functions of the Council are made more precise in sections (a) to (f) of paragraph 1 of the operative section, but any suggestion that operational functions be performed has purposely been omitted: in fact, paragraph 3 specifically states that "the Council should not undertake operational functions."

16. The Council is to be composed of representatives of governments and is to report only to those governments. It is also provided that from among the members of the Council an Executive Committee should be established, and that a secretariat be appointed "which might be made available from the technical staffs of the International Labour Office and other international organizations." The reference to I.L.O. secretariat is permissive, and it is clear that the Council is intended to have no organic connection with the United Nations or any specialized agency.

17. Paragraph 9 of the resolution further recommends that governments "consider most urgently making such arrangements among themselves as may be necessary to deal with difficulties in the field of the transport of migrants." This recommendation will presumably be implemented when the United States in the near future calls, or arranges to have called, a special conference to consider the maintenance of the shipping division and certain other technical services of the I.R.O.

18. This resolution was adopted by the Conference, but with numerous reservations, including recorded abstentions by the United States, Australia and Canada. The Australian representative had originally intended to support the resolution, subject to confirmation by his Government, but he was so antagonized by the attitude of Mr. Rens towards his delegation that he decided to abstain; and at the last moment he received a message from Canberra instructing him to take that course. The Australian abstention, however, was not applied to paragraph 9 dealing with transport of migrants. Argentina also reserved its position; Brazil, Chile, Peru and Venezuela reserved their positions with respect to the inclusion of a reference to refugees in paragraph 9; and at the Committee stage the United Kingdom, Brazil, Chile, The Netherlands, and Germany reserved their positions with respect to financial commitments — though most of these reservations were subsequently dropped after an assurance that no financial commitment was implied at this stage, and paragraph 10 of the report contains a statement to that effect.

19. Although Canada reserved its position pending an opportunity for further study, it may well be that we shall eventually participate in the work of the Council, if it is established. As an important country of immigration we might be able to contribute from our experience something of value to other countries; and although it is unlikely that we should gain much for ourselves, the rather mild form of intergovernmental consultation which is envisaged can hardly hinder, and might help, even us. However, this is a matter which will have to be studied in the light of subsequent developments.

20. The other annexes to the programme committee's report involved much less discussion. Annex 2 is attached only for information. Annex 3 is a resolution on advisory and operational services, and the United States and Canada stated that they wished to vote against paragraphs 5 and 6 in the absence of adequate evidence to justify the expansion of I.L.O. activities mentioned therein. Canada recorded an abstention on this resolution as a whole in view of our objection to the particular paragraphs. Peru also reserved its position with respect to this resolution.

21. Annex 4 contains conclusions with respect to transport. It was agreed that international financial assistance would "to a definite though limited extent" permit increased migration; that Governments should make arrangements among themselves to solve transport difficulties; and that a committee of experts should consider the need for international standards for the accommodation and welfare of migrants on board ship. These conclusions were approved with a reservation by the Delegate of Peru.

22. Annex 5 is a resolution requesting the I.L.O. to convene a meeting of experts to consider accommodation and welfare of migrants on board ship, and to consult with the International Civil Aviation Organization and other appropriate international bodies concerning the safety and welfare of migrants transported by air. The position of the Peruvian Government was also reserved with respect to this resolution, which was otherwise adopted unanimously.

23. Final Conference documents have not yet been issued, but copies will be forwarded to you as soon as they are available.

DESPATCH V-UNNUMBERED Ottawa, March 22, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

I am happy to learn that you will be willing to head the Canadian delegation to the Ninth Session of the Executive Committee and the Seventh Session of the General Council of the International Refugee Organization which will take place in Geneva commencing April 4 and April 9 respectively.[4] The other members of the delegation will be Mr. Berlis, who has attended a number of IRO meetings and is well acquainted with the background of the subjects to be discussed, Mr. Boucher of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, who will be in a position to convey to you detailed views of the interested Departments in Ottawa, and a representative of the Department of Labour, who has not as yet been named but who will probably come from one of the European Missions.

2. The most important subject which is likely to come up for consideration is the continuance of IRO operations beyond September 30, 1951, the cut-off date previously established by the General Council. The reason for the proposal to continue operations beyond this date is that the movement of eligible refugees to the United States has been much slower than anticipated because of administrative difficulties under the newly amended United States Displaced Persons Act and the United States Internal Security Act. According to the Director-General "the United States programme would fall at least 30,000 short on June 30, 1951, of the number for whom visas are authorized". Increased resettlement of IRO refugees in Canada will probably off-set this decrease to some extent, but by no means altogether. A further difficulty is that the provisions of the United States Displaced Persons Act lapse on June 30, 1951. We have been given to understand by the United States Embassy that Congress may advance the date of expiration of the Act from June 30, 1951 to January 1 or July 1, 1952, "in order to give more time for processing the full numbers admissible under the Act. For this reason the United States Government favours action at the forthcoming meeting of the IRO General Council in April 1951, continuing IRO operations after September 30, 1951, until such date as one of the following conditions may arise which would necessitate final closing of IRO operations: (a) that all refugees in Europe available for resettlement have been resettled; (b) that receiving governments are no longer able, or willing, to accept further refugees; (c) that IRO funds have been exhausted".

3. The Canadian delegation may vote in favour of an extension of IRO's activities beyond September 30, 1951, provided that a reasonable case for doing so is presented by the Director-General and no further contributions will be required from member governments to finance the additional period of operations. In particular, the Director-General should be asked to provide satisfactory evidence that the continuance of IRO's activities will ensure the resettlement of sufficient numbers of additional eligible IRO refugees to justify the cost of retaining the administrative services of the Organization. The delegation should not support any proposal to include additional classes of refugees within the mandate of IRO unless the Director-General gives assurances that their inclusion can be financed from the Organization's present resources. In any event, IRO should cease operations as soon as it has expended the funds which are available at the present time.

4. Another question which will probably be considered during the Geneva meetings in the disposition of the so-called institutional "hard core", the persons under IRO care who because of old age or disability must be treated in institutions and cannot therefore qualify for immigration under normal schemes. We have recently been approached by the representative of the IRO in Canada to ask us to consider a proposal for contributing to solving the "hard core" problem. The details of this proposal, which would cost approximately $1,500,000, are under consideration in Ottawa. If necessary, you may say that the Canadian Government is considering the problem, but you should be very careful to make no commitment nor even to imply that there are reasonable grounds to expect that Canada will accept this proposal. I will not in this despatch outline the details of this problem or the contribution we have been asked to make, as Mr. Berlis has been kept fully posted. If any further decisions on this matter are taken before the Council meeting in Geneva, we shall of course let you know.

5. Another question with which the Executive Committee will be asked to deal is the appointment of Mr. Kingsley, the Director-General of IRO, as Agent-General for Korean relief. Mr. Kingsley accepted the appointment as Agent-General for Korean relief several months ago, subject to the approval of the Executive Committee of the International Refugee Organization. The Executive Committee therefore will be asked to say in fact that it has no objection from the point of view of IRO to Mr. Kingsley's accepting the other appointment while still carrying on as Director-General of IRO. We have had considerable doubt as to the wisdom of this double appointment, primarily because we did not think that so difficult an operation as Korean relief could well be directed from Geneva during the next few months. Our principal objection has been due to our concern over the administration of Korean relief rather than our concern over the direction of the IRO, and it might therefore be more appropriate to register our objections in those bodies in which Korean relief is considered. Nevertheless, you should, during the meetings, seek an opportunity of querying the feasibility of Mr. Kingsley's carrying both jobs. I do not suggest, unless you receive further instructions, that you should press these objections to the point of opposing Mr. Kingsley's appointment as Agent-General for Korean relief, but you should press your enquiries until you have received assurances that the two positions can be held simultaneously without harmful effects on the operations of either programme. You should insist, in any case, that the question of whether Mr. Kingsley should carry on as Director-General of IRO should be examined again at the next IRO meeting, which will presumably take place in September, after we know whether IRO will extend its operations beyond September 30, and after a six months' "trial period" has elapsed during which Mr. Kingsley will have held both positions. You will find that on this subject as well Mr. Berlis has been kept fully posted and has at our request discussed the question with officials of the IRO.

6. If any further instructions should prove necessary, we shall send them by telegram to the Geneva office.

CONFIDENTIAL. IMPORTANT.

Following for Doré, Head of Canadian Delegation to IRO.

At an interdepartmental meeting on Monday, April 9, attended by the Deputy Ministers of Labour and of Citizenship and Immigration, keen disappointment was expressed over the failure of IRO to live up to its promise to fill certain specified labour quotas for the month of March. Prospects for April are no brighter. As a result, other sources of supply, particularly of farm labourers, are being canvassed at considerable inconvenience.

2. Dawson of Labour informs us that Lamarre and Berlis are fully acquainted with the situation. The main reason given at the meeting for IRO's failure was poor organization. Other reasons advanced were a desire on the part of many IRO officials to prolong their jobs and thus to delay movements, and disinterest on the part of many refugees on IRO rolls to leave their present homes. While it may be too late for IRO to undertake a reorganization of its methods and techniques, the meeting was strongly of the opinion that we should take some steps to bring our dissatisfaction officially to the attention of the Director-General in the hope that he might be able to make more labourers available of the types which we have requested.

3. I should be grateful if you would consult with Lamarre and Berlis and then approach the Director-General, or one of his senior assistants, to register our disappointment and to impress upon him our desire that the labour quotas which our Labour officials and IRO officials previously agreed upon are as nearly filled as possible.

I.R.O. LABOUR QUOTAS

Upon receipt of your telegram I arranged to see Mr. Kingsley, Director-General of I.R.O., and Mr. Jacobsen, Assistant Director-General in charge of operations. I was accompanied at this meeting by Mr. Lamarre of the Department of Labour, Mr. Boucher of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and Mr. Berlis of our Permanent Delegation in Geneva. The information given in your telegram was transmitted verbally to Messrs. Kingsley and Jacobsen and as a matter of record I handed to them a memorandum† explaining the reasons for the dissatisfaction of the Canadian Government with respect to the failure of the I.R.O. to fill labour quotas and expressing the hope that these quotas might be filled as nearly as possible. A copy of my memorandum is attached for your information.

2. In reply, Mr. Jacobsen pointed out that when agreement was reached last autumn with respect to Canadian labour quotas, the I.R.O. understood that arrangements would be made for families to accompany workers and it was also believed that Canadian selection would take place in outlying areas, such as Greece, and would include newly arrived refugees. Although Mr. Jacobsen said that he understood very well the reasons why it had not been possible to permit families to emigrate with workers, he did feel that at this late date in I.R.O. operations and in view of the tense international situation the fact that immigrants were required to leave their families in Europe deterred a large number from accepting the Canadian schemes. Moreover, although he could not question our security precautions, he believed that the best candidates were now available among newly arrived refugees in outlying areas and so long as these groups were not considered for Canadian selection, our quotas must necessarily be reduced.

3. As an additional reason for failure to meet the Canadian quotas, Mr. Jacobsen mentioned the large number of persons tied up in the United States programme and he claimed that I.R.O. officials were doing everything possible to counsel refugees to apply for Canadian selection. I was also told that the I.R.O. was experiencing some difficulty in popularizing the Canadian programmes at this date after the intensive publicity which had been given to the Australian programme over a period of years. As Mr. Jacobsen explained, "it is difficult to persuade refugees overnight that Canada is the best country in the world when we have been telling them for the past few years that Australia was the best country in the world".

4. Mr. Kingsley and Mr. Jacobsen maintained that they, too, were most dissatisfied with the results of their efforts to meet Canadian labour quotas and they assured me that they would do everything possible to improve this situation. The I.R.O. efforts at improvement, I understand, will include more intensive counselling and a thorough examination of I.R.O. field machinery. A study is also being made of the advisability of applying sanctions against refugees pre-selected for labour schemes who do not respond to calls for visa action.

5. Despite efforts at improvement, however, it is anticipated that I.R.O. will fail to meet Canadian quotas by a number between 4,000 to 8,000 workers. I emphasized that this was a most unsatisfactory situation, and I believe that Mr. Kingsley and Mr. Jacobsen appreciate the reasons for our concern. It is my hope that in view of my representations all possible steps will be taken to obtain better results in future.

6. A memorandum† prepared by the I.R.O. and summarizing their reply to my representations is attached for your information.

IRO "HARD-CORE" CASES

The International Refugee Organization has proposed that Canada guarantee the admission as immigrants of 1,000 T.B. "hard-core" cases after cure in Europe. The total cost of cure is estimated at $2,500 per person and the IRO has set aside $1,000 per case. Canada would be expected to contribute the additional $1,500 required. The IRO has requested that Canada accept cured T.B. cases as soon as released from hospital or reduce the waiting period after cure.

Under the Canadian Immigration Act it would not be possible to make a prior commitment for the admission of Displaced Persons now suffering from tuberculosis. If the present two-year waiting period after release from hospital is eliminated approximately forty per cent of the cases may be expected to suffer a relapse and would require institutional care in Canada. In addition, it would be difficult to reconcile the Canadian standards for cure with those which obtain in Europe.

The following alternative proposals have been discussed by the Interdepartmental Committee on Immigration with representatives of the Privy Council Office, External Affairs, National Health and Welfare, Finance, Labour, Agriculture, Citizenship and Immigration in attendance:

(1) A special Immigration team would interview IRO "hard-core" cases with a view to the selection of workers who could be placed or established in Canada. Workers selected by this special team would be admitted to Canada with their families even if one (or more) of the dependents are certifiable under Section 3 (c) of the Immigration Act. In such cases the worker would be required to agree to precede his dependents to Canada. As soon as suitable arrangements for the reception of the family unit are made by the head of the family or working members, the dependents would be allowed to proceed to Canada. The IRO would provide funds for transportation.

(2) The Canadian Government would accept 125 T.B. cases. This group would be selected by a special Immigration team in Europe and allowed entry to Canada as non-immigrants for treatment in the Department of National Health and Welfare Hospital at Rockhead, Halifax, N.S. The IRO would contribute the $1,000 already allotted for the cure of T.B. "hard-core" cases and the Canadian Government would bear the remaining cost of cure which it is estimated would be approximately $500 per case. It is anticipated that with proper medical supervision in Canada carefully selected cases could be cured rapidly at considerably less cost than that which would be occasioned by providing for such treatment in Europe. After cure, these persons would be granted a landing in Canada. Careful attention in selection would be given to those family units which are prevented from coming forward to Canada because a member of the family is suffering from tuberculosis. The family unit would be allowed to come forward to Canada but in some cases this may require the head of the family or working members to come forward in advance of dependents in order that suitable arrangements for the reception of the family may be made.

(3) The Provincial Governments in Canada would be canvassed to ascertain whether a number of IRO T.B. "hard-core" cases would be accepted by Provincial sanatoria on the basis of a per capita payment of $1,000 by IRO.

(4) In the case of aged persons within the "hard-core" group it is felt that possibly some provision could be made for care and maintenance in Canada through religious or other interested organizations.

The Director-General of IRO has indicated that the above proposals would be satisfactory to his Organization and it is, therefore, recommended that they be adopted as Canada's contribution to the International Refugee Organization "hard-core" problem.

I.R.O. LABOUR QUOTAS

Since our discussion with I.R.O. officials on the subject of Canadian labour quotas a few weeks ago, I have continued to keep in touch with the Secretariat in the hope that some solution might be found to the problem which is of concern both to the Canadian Government and to the I.R.O. As a result of these continued discussions, I am now enclosing an aide-mémoire† prepared by the I.R.O. which refers to a specific proposal for a publicity campaign which it is hoped will assist the I.R.O. in meeting our labour quotas in a more satisfactory manner than has appeared probable during recent weeks.

2. The aide-mémoire is not satisfactorily drafted and I have questioned the responsible officials with respect to certain parts of the document. However, it seems advisable to avoid further delay in bringing this matter to your attention and it is my hope that some additional explanation may clarify several ambiguous references in the document.

3. The thought behind the proposal for a publicity campaign is that the Australian and United States programmes have been so widely publicized that many suitable persons within the I.R.O. mandate are aware of those schemes but know nothing of the attractive possibilities in Canada. Despite I.R.O. efforts to overcome this situation through normal counselling, there seems to be no way of reaching the large number of refugees not living in camps and it is this group which the I.R.O. would particularly hope to reach through a concentrated publicity campaign.

4. At the same time the I.R.O. is reluctant to embark on such an enterprise without the assurance that the Canadian Departments of Government concerned would approve of this procedure for some informal conversations held sometime ago led the I.R.O. to believe that the Canadian authorities might not favour such a programme. The Canadian objection would presumably be based on the theory that refugees if they are to become good citizens should be sufficiently interested in Canada to apply for visas without being persuaded by propaganda. The answer to this objection obviously is that refugees will never express interest in a country about which they know little or nothing and the purpose of the campaign is merely to overcome lack of knowledge.

5. This background will explain the final sentence of the first paragraph in the aide-mémoire which relates to the unenthusiastic response which I.R.O. officials apparently received when the possibility of a publicity campaign was mentioned informally to Canadian officials in Geneva sometime ago. It is my own belief that conditions have changed sufficiently so that any hesitation felt a year ago might no longer be justified now that the Canadian immigration programme has been so greatly enlarged.

6. With respect to the 5th paragraph of the aide-mémoire, I questioned the possibility of obtaining information material from Canada in sufficient time to make possible an effective publicity campaign such as the I.R.O. now envisages. I was assured, however, that the programme will not depend on supplies of information material which would have to be obtained from Canada but that it would be chiefly conducted through advertisement in appropriate newspapers and periodicals as well as through radio networks and newsreels. At the same time, however, the campaign could only be effective if the I.R.O. could enjoy the full cooperation of Canadian Labour and Immigration officials in Europe and the Organization would be reluctant to undertake a publicity campaign without being assured in advance of such cooperation.

7. These same comments will serve to explain the meaning of the 6th paragraph of the aide-mémoire.

8. The 7th and 8th paragraphs of the document suggest that Canada might agree to share the cost of the publicity campaign and I pointed out the obvious objections to such a proposal. I explained that when labour quotas were established last autumn, there was no question of any additional financial contribution by the Canadian Government and there seemed to be no reason why Canada should now contribute additional funds in order to enable the I.R.O. to live up to its promises when presumably our manpower needs might have been obtained through other channels if we had been made aware at an earlier date that the I.R.O. could not do what it had agreed to do. It was pointed out further that the question of financial assistance would require lengthy negotiation and consideration which would make it impossible to undertake a publicity campaign at a time when it might be effective for the specific purpose of meeting Canadian labour quotas.

9. On this question of finances I was assured that it was not intended to delay the publicity campaign merely to obtain a Canadian contribution towards its cost. The I.R.O. feels that as a matter of record the Canadian Government should be invited to participate in meeting the cost of the programme but it is my understanding that the I.R.O. will still be prepared to undertake a publicity campaign even without financial assistance from the Canadian Government. It does appear, therefore that the question of whether or not such a campaign is appropriate might be discussed by the interested authorities in Ottawa without answering immediately the invitation of the IRO for financial assistance.

10. The final paragraph of the I.R.O. document suggests that a publicity campaign if it is to be effective should begin not later than May 7th. It is quite obvious that there would be some delay in seeing any results from the campaign envisaged and as its specific purpose will be to assist in meeting labour quotas urgently required, the campaign should begin as soon as possible. At the same time, I pointed out that there must necessarily be some discussion of this proposal in Ottawa and as rather more explanation is required than would be possible by telegraphic communication, it seems unlikely that the dateline of May 7th can be met. This objection was appreciated and I was informed that the date of May 7th had been inserted merely to indicate the urgency which the I.R.O. attaches to the problem.

11. On more general lines I have been given to understand that the I.R.O.'s chief concern is that the record should show that the Canadian Government has agreed that a publicity campaign should be conducted so that other states members of the Organization will be less likely to suggest that more favourable treatment is being given to Canada than to other countries. Plans have already been prepared for this publicity campaign and it can begin immediately in Germany, Austria and Italy if the Canadian Government will indicate its wish to have such a campaign conducted and its assurance that the I.R.O. will have the collaboration of appropriate Canadian officials in the field. If it is considered that the proposed publicity campaign would be of value, you might wish to inform me by telegram in order that the campaign may be instituted without delay.

12. To provide you with further information concerning this matter, I am attaching a copy of a letter dated April 27th† from Mr. Pryor, Director of Public Information in I.R.O., who has furnished certain explanatory notes as a result of our conversations.

Your letter No. 185 of April 28 — IRO publicity campaign.

1. Both the Departments of Labour and of Citizenship and Immigration have agreed that IRO might carry out the proposed campaign in Germany, Austria and Italy. When informing the IRO officials you might explain that the publicity should be appropriate and that great care should of course be taken to avoid making any statements which could be interpreted later as not being in accordance with the facts or any promises which could not be fulfilled. Further, we think that the cost of the campaign should be borne entirely by IRO. Canadian Labour and Immigration officials in Europe are being asked to cooperate with IRO officials in this matter.

2. We regret the delay in replying. It does not mean that the Departments concerned are not in favour of the campaign, which should be undertaken as soon as possible.

INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION; 'HARD-CORE' CASES

18. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reported that the International Refugee Organization had asked if Canada could guarantee the admission as immigrants of 1,000 T.B. 'hard-core' cases after cure in Europe. The average cost of cure was estimated at $2,500 per person for which I.R.O. had set aside $1,000 and Canada had been asked whether it could contribute the additional $1,500 required. The Organization had requested that Canada accept cured T.B. cases as soon as released from hospitals or that the normal two year waiting period after cure be reduced.

The Interdepartmental Committee on Immigration, after reviewing the suggestion, had submitted the following proposals for consideration. The first involved selection by special immigration teams of workers who could be placed in Canada and whose family included one or more T.B. cases. After selection, the worker would be required to precede his dependents here on the understanding that his family, including those members presently inadmissible, would be brought forward as soon as suitable arrangements had been made for their reception. I.R.O. would provide funds for transportation. The second was that the government agree to accept 125 T.B. cases for treatment in the National Health and Welfare Hospital at Rockhead, Halifax, N.S. on the understanding that I.R.O. would contribute $1,000 per individual. The Canadian government would assume the remaining cost which was estimated to be approximately $500 per case. After cure, which would likely be more rapid in Canada, these persons would be granted landing. The third alternative entailed approaching provincial governments with a view to ascertaining whether a number of I.R.O. T.B. cases would be accepted in provincial sanatoria on the basis of a per capita contribution of $1,000 by I.R.O.

There proposals had been concurred in by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, May 21, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 173-51.)

19. The Prime Minister said that, as the allies had a joint moral obligation in respect of I.R.O. problems, each participating country should bear an appropriate share of the burden arising out of the winding up of the Organization.

20. The Minister of National Health and Welfare voiced some doubt as to the advisability of admitting uncured T.B. cases to Canada.

21. The Minister of National Revenue pointed out that active T.B. cases admitted to Canada might be carriers of new strains of tuberculosis against which the Canadian population had not built up a resistance and it was possible that any new type of tuberculosis might spread rapidly. In the circumstances, it might be preferable for Canada to incur the heavier expenditures involved in effecting cures in European rather than in Canadian sanatoria.

22. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, deferred decision on the proposals submitted by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration with respect to the admission of a certain number of International Refugee Organization 'hard-core' T.B. cases.

TENTH SESSION OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE AND EIGHTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

At its meeting on Monday, October 15 Cabinet approved the instructions contained in the attached memorandum subject to your concurrence. The memorandum was submitted by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration after it had been drafted by the Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Immigration.

In brief, the Delegation is instructed to use its influence to see that I.R.O. terminates its operations as scheduled on December 31, 1951 and that Canada is not committed to contributing to any fund for the emergency needs of refugees without further consideration in Ottawa (in point of fact it appears likely that the General Assembly will be asked to consider the establishment of such a fund). In addition, the Delegation is asked to bear in mind the possible advantages of keeping in operation the I.R.O. fleet of ships and movement personnel after the Organization winds up. The United States is considering taking the initiative in calling a conference next month, either in Washington or in France, to decide on making an ad hoc temporary arrangement along these lines.

I should be grateful if you would indicate whether or not you approve of these instructions so that the Delegation in Geneva may be notified. The meetings commence on Thursday, October 18.[5]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, October 12, 1951

TENTH SESSION OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE AND EIGHTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL COUNCIL OF THE INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION

1. The Tenth Session of the Executive Committee of the International Refugee Organization will open on October 18; the Eighth Session of the General Council of the same body will open on October 22. Both meetings will take place in Geneva.

2. Cabinet approval was granted on October 5, 1951, to the composition of the Canadian Delegation to the above conferences which, in view of the approaching termination of the International Refugee Organization's activities, will be the last to be held.[6]

3. It is expected that the conferences will be principally concerned with winding up the operations of the International Refugee Organization. They will also probably be concerned with any proposals arising out of the Naples Conference of the International Labour Organization.

4. Accordingly It is recommended that the Canadian Delegation to the two I.R.O. conferences at Geneva be issued with the following instructions:

(i) It should follow closely the instructions already approved by Cabinet which were issued to the Canadian Delegation to the I.L.O. Migration Conference at Naples.[7]

(ii) It should base its position on the assumption that I.R.O. will in fact terminate its operations on December 31, 1951. There is no evidence to the contrary in the Director-General's report, and both the United States and United Kingdom Governments have informed us that they are proceeding on this assumption. In the event that other governments should seek a renewal of the I.R.O. mandate the Canadian Delegation should assist the United States and the United Kingdom to resist this move.

The Canadian delegation was led by G.L. Magann, Ambassador in Greece.

[7] Voir le document 277./See Document 277.

(iii) It should examine critically plans for utilizing the remaining funds of I.R.O. and emphasize the necessity for making the best possible use of the available resources. This will involve a detailed examination of the Director-General's plans, including any operations contemplated during 1952. The Delegation should discourage any proposed activities which might be better carried on by other United Nations bodies such as the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees.

(iv) It should bear in mind the possible advantages of maintaining programmes that would keep in operation the I.R.O. movement personnel and fleet until the United States has reached a conclusion covering the use of these facilities in any European migration scheme.

(v) It should carefully avoid committing the Government to support any proposals for further contributions to I.R.O. for assistance to refugees. The Director-General of I.R.O. has already suggested the establishment of an international fund "to be used to meet the emergency needs of refugees as they arise." In the unlikely event that suggestions of this nature receive support from major contributors, particularly the United States, the Delegation should request further guidance from Ottawa.

INTERNATIONAL REFUGEE ORGANIZATION; "HARD-CORE" CASES

9. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, referring to discussion at the meeting of June 15th, 1951, said that a decision would have to be reached at an early date on the request put forward some time ago by the International Refugee Organization for Canadian assistance in disposing of the remaining "hard-core" problem.

10. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that, of the 46,711 "hard-core" cases (including the blind, the tubercular, etc.) which had already been settled, 26,675 had been accepted for permanent care by various countries and the remainder resettled by other means. There remained a total of 5,613 "hard-core" cases still to be disposed of before the Organization concluded its operation at the end of this year. The total of 26,675 "hard-core" cases accepted for permanent care could be broken down as follows:

Western Germany	9,165
France	7,354
Israel	5,467
United States	1,637
Austria	902
Denmark	310
Netherlands	282
Sweden	259
Belgium	235
Australia	224
Switzerland	207
United Kingdom	183
Canada	160 (all T.B.)
Other countries	290

11. The Minister of National Revenue again voiced his apprehension lest acceptance on a wide scale of I.R.O. T.B. "hard-core" cases might introduce new strains of tuberculosis hitherto unknown in this country. In the circumstances he would think it preferable for Canada to contribute funds to I.R.O. for the treatment of an agreed number of these cases in Europe.

12. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that, although he was personally inclined to share the views held by Dr. McCann, he had been given assurances by the medical authorities of his department that the matter had been carefully considered and that there did not appear to be any danger of infection spreading as a result of these admissions.

He added that, although the discovery of 80 active tubercular cases amongst Polish soldiers admitted to Canada at the termination of World War II had constituted a real problem at that time, all these cases had now been discharged from hospital without any apparent resulting difficulty.

13. The Prime Minister suggested that more information be secured on the 160 T.B. "hard-core" cases, for which Canada had allegedly assumed permanent responsibility, before reaching a final decision as to what further aid might be extended to I.R.O. towards the solution of the remaining "hard-core" problem.

14. The Cabinet, after discussion, noted the reports by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration and the Secretary of State for External Affairs respecting proposals for Canadian participation in the disposition of the remaining I.R.O. "hard-core" problem and deferred decision pending submission of further information as to the extent and nature of the responsibility already assumed by Canada in this respect.

10TH SESSION OF I.R.O. EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE AND 8TH SESSION OF I.R.O. GENERAL COUNCIL

The 10th Session of the Executive Committee of the International Refugee Organization opened at Geneva on October 18th and the 8th Session of the General Council began on October 22nd. Both sessions were concluded on October 27th.

2. There would appear to be no necessity for me to report specifically on the work of the Executive Committee as the discussions which took place in that body were repeated and expanded at subsequent meetings of the General Council. It is therefore my intention to explain the principal decisions which were reached and to refer to some of the more important views expressed during our debates without attempting to specify whether the discussions took place in the Executive Committee or the General Council.

3. During a discussion on the annual report of the Director-General for the period 1 July 1950 to 30 June 1951 (Document G.C./227),† particular attention was paid to Chapter 3 dealing with institutional hard-core cases and the Director-General was able to report that at the time of meeting, there remained only 477 institutional hard-core cases within the I.R.O. mandate for whom reasonably satisfactory arrangements had not been made or were not in progress. This is, of course, a substantial achievement, and although the residual figure includes a large number of persons in Shanghai for whom it appears virtually impossible to provide any satisfactory relief, the administration still hopes that some additional means may be found for reducing the remaining number of institutional cases still further. In fact, during this discussion, the representative of the Netherlands informed the Council that in the spirit of the humanitarian appeal which Her Majesty the Queen of the Netherlands had addressed to President Truman on the subject of refugees, and the reply which was received from the President, the Netherlands Government had decided to grant admittance to a group of between 100 and 200 residual cases and urged other governments to adopt similar measures.

4. With respect to the financial statements, it was apparent from the documents before us and from the explanations given by the Director-General that the I.R.O. is in a very desirable liquid position with almost all contributions received and with very few outstanding accounts of any importance. There are two principal items which are still the subject of negotiation and these involve settlement of the food credit account in Germany and an agreement with the Australian Government concerning contributions towards transportation costs to that country.

5. The revised plan of expenditure for the supplementary period (Document G.C./239)† which was approved by this Session of the Council, provides for the resettlement of 9,000 additional refugees for $1,300,000 less than the plan adopted at the previous session. The Director-General explained, however, that this plan was based on a combination of favourable circumstances which it was hoped would continue, such as satisfactory use of shipping facilities and the likelihood of making provision for institutional hard-core cases for a smaller figure than previously anticipated thereby releasing $3,000,000 to be applied to other parts of the programme.

6. The revised plan of expenditure was adopted by the Council with the clear understanding that the Director-General would, during the closure period, exercise the utmost caution to ensure that obligations would only be assumed within the limit of available funds so that the I.R.O. might eventually be liquidated in a business-like manner without any outstanding debts.

7. With respect to outstanding claims, the Council adopted a resolution to be transmitted to the Allied High Commission for Germany and to other interested authorities or Governments, urging that all possible measures be taken to bring negotiations to an early conclusion and thus make assets available for utilization during the limited remainder of the lifetime of the I.R.O. Although this resolution refers specifically to the Food Credit Account in Germany, it is understood that its general clauses are also intended to refer to negotiations with the Government of Australia.

8. The plans of the Director-General for the termination of I.R.O. operations and for the liquidation of the Organization are set out in Document GC/242,† which was approved with minor amendments. It is expected that operations will have been substantially completed by December 31, 1951, and that available funds will also be exhausted by that time. The Director-General anticipates, however, that on December 31st there will remain about 10,000 persons, mostly in Germany, who will be visaed for resettlement, chiefly in the United States. To the extent that funds become available, either from the Food Replacement Account in Germany, from negotiations with the Australian Government, of from sales of property, it is proposed that an effort should be made to move this group which is ready for resettlement during the first month or two of 1952. If these final operations become possible, it is proposed that the embarkation centre at Bremen, and small reception staffs in the United States and Canada, might be retained for a brief period after December 31st.

9. Liquidation will, however, proceed simultaneously with any residual operations, and in fact liquidation of the Organization's staff and assets has been going on for some time.

10. No matter when final operations are completed, it is anticipated that liquidation will be achieved six months later. If operations cease on December 31, therefore, liquidation will be substantially completed by June 30, 1952. Although June 30 is being taken as a target date for the completion of the liquidation programme, it must be understood that if operations continue for a month or two during the year 1952, final liquidation will be delayed by that length of time.

11. Even in the face of uncertainties such as the amount of available funds and the numbers who will be ready for resettlement at the end of the year, the Director-General believes that a liquidator should be appointed about January 1st on the understanding that he will operate as a staff officer until the conclusion of operations and assume formally his functions as liquidator when operations have been concluded.

12. As other delegations, including those of the United States and the United Kingdom, gave their approval to the Director-General's proposals for the termination of operations and liquidation of the Organization, the Canadian Delegation did not object to the possibility of residual operations being carried over into the first months of 1952. This position seems the more reasonable when it is noted that the funds which might finance residual operations are not yet available; and if the termination date of December 31st were to be adhered to too strictly, the possibility would arise of having unused funds left over and a substantial number of refugees ready for resettlement who would not be able to benefit from the availability of such funds.

13. The most lengthy discussion, both at the Executive Committee and at the General Council, concerned the treatment to be afforded residual problems for which funds are not at present available and for which no provision has therefore been made in the revised Plan of Expenditure for the supplementary period. In addition to the movement after December 31st of refugees fully visaed and ready to move to the United States and other countries, no provision has been made for the permanent care of institutional hard-core cases in Shanghai, or a remaining group of refugees in Samar. Nor has it been possible to provide for terminal grants to voluntary societies and refugee service committees which will be carrying on programmes for refugees eligible for I.R.O. assistance.

14. Some pressure was advanced for further efforts to assist the refugees in Shanghai, but no practical suggestions were made. As the Director-General explained that despite all efforts it had not been possible to make any arrangements for assistance to this group after the termination of I.R.O., the Council had to be content with a general assurance that no effort would be spared to seek a solution to this particular problem.

15. Pressure was also exerted by the Italian Delegation, supported warmly by the French, and with some encouragement from Switzerland, on behalf of the refugees in Trieste, who are a burden on the Italian Government. This discussion demonstrated clearly the difficulty of trying to establish any firm criteria for assistance to residual cases as the circumstances which will exist some months hence cannot be exactly foreseen, nor can the amount of funds likely to be available on termination of normal operations be estimated with any certainty. In these circumstances, the Director-General proposed that he be authorized to employ any additional miscellaneous income received between now and the next meeting of the Council in accordance with the following general priorities:

1st priority—Material assistance to persons who would otherwise be in danger of their lives, and to remaining institutional cases;

2nd priority—Continuance of resettlement;

3rd priority—Material assistance for the non-institutional residual group.

16. The Council agreed that, in view of all uncertainties, it would not be possible at this stage to bind the Director-General by more strict priorities, and it was agreed that his suggestions should provide the basis for operations until the next meeting of the Council.

17. With respect to residual problems, the Council also approved a form of communication to the General Assembly of the United Nations, which is not intended to constitute a final report of the I.R.O. but is meant to supply immediately information which may be of value to the Assembly in its examination of the problem of assistance to refugees. The document refers to the situation existing in several European countries, the Middle and Far East, and in the Philippines, pointing out that groups of refugees in need of assistance are likely to remain in those areas. The communication makes no attempt to submit recommendations to the General Assembly, but aims only at a statement of facts. Having approved the text of this communication, the Council also adopted a resolution requesting the Director-General to transmit the document to the General Assembly for consideration at its Sixth Session.

18. It is interesting to note that during this discussion the United States and the United Kingdom expressed reluctance to include in the document any explicit reference to Germany and Austria, arguing that such reference might reflect upon the capacity of those countries to provide adequate relief facilities. It was, of course, pointed out that the same argument might be advanced against the specific mention of any countries or areas, but that the result of omitting precise references would be to make the document so general in character that it would not adequately reflect the concern of the Council, nor would it appropriately describe the conditions on which such concern is based.

19. It is thought that the reluctance of the United States and the United Kingdom to emphasize residual refugee problems in Germany and Austria might have been due to their concern lest any detailed description of conditions encourage at the Assembly proposals for the establishment of new operational machinery. The French, on the other hand, who took the initiative in seeking to make the communication to the United Nations as detailed and as dramatic as possible, do not hide the fact that, in their opinion, a successor organization to the I.R.O. should be established.

20. Despite these differing viewpoints, discussions at this Conference were fairly successfully limited to operations within the I.R.O. mandate, and were not expanded to include the possibility of further international action on behalf of refugees after the termination of I.R.O. This latter possibility was feared by some delegations, but it is assumed that efforts to promote the idea of a successor organization have been reserved for the General Assembly.

21. It was agreed that, for the orderly termination of I.R.O. activities, it will be necessary to hold another meeting of the General Council and perhaps of the Executive Committee. Among the problems to be settled by the Council will be: disposal of any residual funds, the appointment of a liquidator, and disposal of records. The Director-General believes that the next meeting should be late enough to permit the administration to present exact facts and figures with respect to the remaining problems, and it was suggested that such a meeting could perhaps be held early in January. The Executive Committee agreed that its chairman might call a further meeting in consultation with the Director-General, and the Council agreed that its Ninth Session might similarly be convened by the Chairman of the Executive Committee in consultation with the Director-General.

22. I was assisted at this Conference by Mr. J. Boucher, representing the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, Mr. S. H. McLaren, representing the Department of Labour, and Mr. N.F.H. Berlis of our Permanent Delegation to the European Office of the United Nations. The experience and advice of these members of the delegation were very helpful.

IMMIGRATION; I.R.O. "HARD-CORE" CASES

24. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, referring to discussion at the meeting of October 25th, 1951, said he had ascertained that the report under discussion at that time was incorrect and that no T.B. cases had arrived in Canada. 160 persons, otherwise handicapped physically, however, had been accepted. The question now was the admission, as suggested, of 125 T.B. cases. Of these, 35 were persons still under the care of I.R.O. and were also dependents of persons in Canada.

25. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that:

(a) the International Refugee Organization be informed that the Canadian government was not prepared to accept 125 T.B. cases as proposed, but that an individual examination would be made of 35 of the persons involved who were dependents of residents of Canada to ascertain whether their admission might be granted; and,

(b) immediate consideration be given to other contributions that might be made by Canada toward settlement of the "hard-core" cases.

IRO INSTITUTIONAL "HARD CORE" PROBLEM

We have considered your letter of November 10† concerning Cabinet's decision of October 31 on the above subject. Under the circumstances, we are inclined to agree with you that we might wait for the IRO to make the next move. We should not, however, wish to defer too long consideration of the Cabinet decision that "immediate consideration be given to other contributions that might be made by Canada toward settlement of the 'hard core' cases".

2. Perhaps you may wish to explain to Mr. Allard that we are not proposing to take any initiative at this time, as Canada's policy on the broader subject of "assistance to refugees" has yet to be determined in the light of developments at the Sixth Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

3. As you know, "The Problems of Assistance to Refugees" is on the Assembly's agenda and the General Council of IRO approved the text of a communication on this subject to the Assembly at its recent meetings in Geneva. This communication, of course, refers to the "hard core" refugees as part of the problem which will remain after the IRO suspends operations.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 29, 1951

SIXTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL CONFERENCE OF UNESCO, JUNE 18-JULY 11, 1951
GENERAL INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE CANADIAN DELEGATION[8]

The instructions for the Canadian delegation to the Paris Conference are now being prepared in the form of a commentary. Considerations underlying them are as follows:

Administrative Efficiency

2. In the field of organization and finance the Organization faces a serious situation in the cash deficit caused by the non-payment of contributions by some Member States. A draft amendment to paragraph C.8.b. of Article IV of the Constitution, intended to remedy the situation, will accordingly come before the Procedure Committee of the General Conference for consideration. The Canadian delegation will be instructed to support this amendment.

3. On the other hand, the accounts and estimates have been presented by the Secretariat with great care, and the administrative management and budgeting staff of the Organization may be commended in this respect for their diligence, efficiency and accuracy.

Economy in the Operations of UNESCO

4. The extent to which the Secretariat of UNESCO is exercising the administrative economies called for by the General Conference is satisfactory. The Programme of UNESCO is approved by the General Conference, and once it goes to the Secretariat for implementation, the sum placed at the disposal of UNESCO for each Item of the Programme is usually properly expended. It is therefore not in the execution of the Programme as much as in its preparation that savings could be effected. The Canadian delegation will accordingly be instructed to stress the importance of limiting the expansion of UNESCO operations in new fields, in order that more attention may be devoted to the projects already under way. In this connection, the Canadian delegation will also be instructed to bear in mind that the establishment by the General Conference of a budget ceiling for the ensuing year would considerably reduce this risk of dispersion and diffuseness noticeable in the Programme. Substantial saving may be effected moreover through a more adequate use of the facilities of well-established, private, international agencies which are pursuing aims similar to those of UNESCO.

[8] Le chef de la délégation était Victor Doré, ministre en Suisse.
The Canadian delegation was led by Victor Doré, Minister in Switzerland.

Concentration of Purpose

5. From UNESCO's inception, the annual programme has been open to Canadian criticisms on the ground that the resources of the Organization were spread over a relatively large number of activities instead of being concentrated on a few projects of major importance. Progress is now being made in setting programme priorities, in such a way that attention is focused on essential projects and emphasis may be shifted from year to year according to the urgency of particular items.

6. You will recall that the Canadian delegation at the Fifth Session introduced a proposal on "the selection of central UNESCO themes" which was designed to invest the Director-General with authority to determine an order of priorities among the various projects singled for discussion. It is therefore of interest to note the inclusion on the Agenda of the Programme and the Official and External Relations Committees of the General Conference, of an item respecting the criteria adopted by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations for the establishment of priorities in the programmes of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies. The Canadian delegation will be instructed to press for the adoption of these criteria.

Co-ordination with the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies

7. During 1950, stress was again given by the General Assembly and by the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, to the proper co-ordination of the activities of the United Nations and the Specialized Agencies. A perusal of the working documents prepared on this subject by the Secretariat of UNESCO show that some encouraging steps in the right direction have already been taken by the Organization. The Canadian delegation will therefore be instructed to support measures intended to ensure at all times the fullest collaboration of UNESCO with the United Nations and its Specialized Agencies in the elaboration or clarification of its Programme.

UNESCO and the Threat to Peace

8. It will be recalled that at the Fifth Session of the General Conference, the United States delegation raised the question of the extent to which UNESCO's programme activities could contribute more directly to the furtherance of world peace. The impression was gained by several delegations that the United States wished to see UNESCO become the propaganda arm of the United Nations.

9. Subsequently this question was given prominence as a result of communist aggression in Korea. The United States representative on the Executive Board, in August 1950, put forward the suggestion that, as a result of the United Nations decision to take military action in Korea, UNESCO should be asked to provide relief and reconstruction facilities in that country, and also to justify the United Nations action in Korea against the aggressor.

10. In any discussion which may arise on this subject I would suggest, if you approve, that the Canadian delegation be guided in their attitude by the following remarks which I addressed to the Canadian Minister in Berne on August 25, 1950:

"You will have seen, I imagine, the perceptive article on 'Theory and Practice of UNESCO' by Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, which appeared in the February issue of International Organization. After praising a great number of the projects which UNESCO had undertaken, Dr. Niebuhr argued that 'the error of UNESCO lies in its claim that its various forms of cultural co-operation are of immediate political significance in resolving overt conflicts in the world community'. We are inclined to agree with him that UNESCO must find its justification in the contribution it makes to the gradual integration of the emergent world community rather than its supposed, but usually illusory contributions to 'peace'.

"It would be wrong, of course, for UNESCO to attempt to divorce itself from the present political circumstances in which its activities must be conducted. In particular, I think, it would be mistaken for our participation in UNESCO to result in any weakening of our resistance, both in the realms of action and of doctrine, to the programme of Soviet Communism. On the other hand, it is of importance that there should be bodies primarily concerned with such measures as may be taken to ease the adjustments which are necessary between the various civilizations in the world today. UNESCO is one such body; and its usefulness in the long run might be seriously jeopardized if it were to be harnessed too closely now to the action which the United States and other countries are taking in Korea under the auspices of the United Nations. Under present circumstances total diplomacy is no doubt a necessity. But you would agree, I imagine, that we should take care to see that it stops short of totalitarianism.

"You might like to consider whether it would not be wise for the Executive Committee in a matter of this importance to postpone a decision until the United States proposals could be studied by national governments."

11. This attitude finds support in the words of one of the founders of UNESCO, Archibald MacLeish, spoken before the United States National Commission for UNESCO on May 10, 1951:

"It is not the province of the Organization to act as a propaganda agency of the West in the current East-West conflict. ... Peace is not won by emphasis on a split world."

It is further borne out by the following remarks made by the United Kingdom delegation in its report on the Fifth Session of the General Conference:

"It is true that some educational, scientific and cultural activities can have some immediate bearing upon political affairs but most of them have not, for they depend for their effective realization upon the free growth of the human mind. Any question of their employment for political ends would therefore call for the most careful consideration first of all on political grounds by the United Nations before they were considered by UNESCO. Attempts upon totalitarian lines to indoctrinate whole peoples rapidly according to preconceived political patterns, however worthy in themselves, are not only contrary to the spirit of UNESCO's Constitution, but strike at the very root of the concept of the intrinsic worth of the individual and of a free society which was the inspiration of that Constitution itself."

12. I should be grateful if you would indicate whether you approve of instructions being prepared for our Delegation to the forthcoming session of the General Conference of UNESCO on the basis of the above mentioned considerations.[9]

UNESCO SIXTH SESSION OF THE GENERAL CONFERENCE

17. Mr. Day. The Sixth Session which opened in Paris on June 18 concluded on July 11. This Session was mainly concerned with administrative and financial matters and a number of changes have been made which were supported and recommended by the Canadian delegation. It was agreed that after 1952 the Conference would assemble every second year. The budget has been held to the figure suggested by the Director General, a figure only slightly higher than the one recommended by the Canadian and other delegations. It was also agreed that as an economy measure the Seventh Session in 1952 would be held in Paris rather than in Montevideo as planned: this will mean a saving of some $400,000.

18. Some success has been achieved by those delegations including the Canadian, which have long urged that UNESCO confine its activities to its general terms of reference. Thus, for example, a proposal that UNESCO request ECOSOC to summon a comprehensive conference on newsprint production and distribution was amended, and it is now proposed to leave this matter largely to the International Materials Conference of ECOSOC. During the coming year the resources of UNESCO will be increasingly concentrated on fundamental needs, although care will be given to regional requirements. A second centre of fundamental education will be created, but the establishment of four additional centres is to be postponed and UNESCO's programme will pay close attention to the U.N. Programme of Technical Assistance. UNESCO assistance is now being offered in six major fields, including fundamental education and scientific advisory services. Other UNESCO projects for 1952 include the preparation of an international covenant to protect historic monuments in the event of war; a universal copyright convention on which an international conference will be held next year; the spreading of knowledge through the translation of the world's classics, and the extension of the system of book, gift and scientific coupons.

19. The total membership of UNESCO is now 64, since the German Federal Republic, the Kingdom of Laos, the Kingdom of Cambodia, the State of Viet Nam, and Japan have completed requirements for membership. Sir John Maud, delegate of the United Kingdom, paid a warm tribute to Mr. Victor Doré who is now retiring from the Executive Board. (UNCLASSIFIED)

Note de la délégation à la sixième Session de la Conférence générale de l'Organisation des Nations Unies pour l'éducation, la science et la culture pour le sous-secrétaire d'État adjoint aux Affaires extérieures

Memorandum from Delegation to Sixth Session of General Conference of UNESCO to Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, September 15, 1951

I am enclosing, for your consideration, the confidential report of the Canadian Delegation to the 6th Session of the General Conference of UNESCO held in Paris from June 18 to July 12, 1951.†

In transmitting this report, to which has been attached copy of the resolutions adopted by the General Conference, I would ask leave to bring to your attention certain recommendations endorsed by the Delegation with respect to Canadian representation to future sessions of the Organization.

First and foremost, I think, is the question of Canada's interest in the programme of UNESCO. The pressure of growing defence expenditure and other national budgetary demands naturally forces the Government to call for economies, concentration of purposes, greater administrative efficiency and clear cut priorities in all the programmes of the international agencies in which the country participates. What must not be forgotten, however, is that these organizations were not created to be the sport of circumstances. In the words of the Director General, UNESCO was and is meant to be the adjunct of the United Nations themselves, in consolidating international peace by means of cooperation between peoples in educational, scientific and cultural matters.

Looking over the instructions to Canadian Delegations to past sessions of UNESCO I wonder, in this connection, if perhaps we have not been too concerned with matters of financial import for what the Organization could offer or strove to achieve through its programme. The implementation of the Massey Report's[10] recommendations with regard to the establishment in Canada of a National Commission for UNESCO may provide us with the answer to this problem. By drawing members of future delegations from the ranks of the body (National Commission or Canadian Council) Canada would be in a position to offer something constructive with regard to the different projects which come annually for consideration before the General Conference. As matters stand, however well we choose our delegates, our role is confined to holding what is at best a watching brief. This situation will continue to obtain as long as there exist no proper means to consult with Canadian Organizations interested in UNESCO's cultural, scientific and educational ventures. It is only through continual consultation that instructions to Canadian delegations can and will be all embracing and permit our representatives in turn to prove to the nations of the world that Canada, although young, has developed culturally as well as materially.

Without further investigation into the reasons which have forced us to adjourn the creation of a National Commission, the fact remains that, until its inception, we will continue to be ignored in the formation of the Commissions and Committees as we have experienced at the Sixth Session. It is perhaps unnecessary to recall that the General conference comprises six Committees (General or Steering Committee), composed of the President, the Vice-Presidents of the Conference, together with the Chairmen of its various Commissions and that in the case of the Commissions, not only is a Chairman appointed, but also a Vice-Chairman and a rapporteur; and that Canada, one of the largest contributors to UNESCO, was not chosen for nomination to any of these posts at the Sixth Session of the General Conference.

It may be argued that a certain amount of lobbying would ensure this. The answer to this, I fear, is rather that, unless the delegates are more conversant with what I would describe as the routine of General Conferences and that Canada as a Member State shows more interest in the programme proper, this state of affairs will continue to obtain.

This brings us to consider the necessity for continuity as regards Canadian delegations to UNESCO. Part of the answer to this question might be possibly supplied by the nomination as Adviser on the Delegation to next year's session of the General Conference of a departmental officer who served in the past as Secretary to one Canadian Delegation to UNESCO, preferably the last. This would considerably reduce the handicap experienced by delegates through their unfamiliarity with UNESCO meetings and afford to the Junior Officer on the delegation the invaluable benefit of experience in the handling of his secretarial duties.

[10] La Commission royale sur le développement des arts, des lettres et des sciences a été mise sur pied en avril 1949 pour se pencher sur l'éducation, la culture et les grands moyens de communication au Canada. Elle était présidée par Vincent Massey. Le rapport de la commission, publié en juin 1951, annonçait une nouvelle ère d'intervention gouvernementale dans la culture canadienne.
The Royal Commission on National Development in the Arts, Letters and Sciences was appointed in April 1949 to explore education, culture and the mass media in Canada. Its chairman was Vincent Massey. The commission's report, published in June 1951, heralded a new era of government involvement in Canadian culture.

If at all possible, especially when sessions are held in Paris, there should also be added to the Delegation as Adviser, the Information Officer of the Embassy who normally acts as unofficial Liaison Officer between the Government and UNESCO. The information gleaned by such an officer during the intervals between sessions might well offset the delays experienced by the Department in awaiting the despatch by UNESCO of the provisional agenda of forthcoming Conferences. It would by the same token afford the Department longer time in the preparation of the official instructions.

It will be within the knowledge of the Department that 22 Member States, including the United Kingdom and the United States of America, have permanent delegates to UNESCO, some of them with offices at UNESCO House. The information which they obtain on the spot and through admission to the public meetings of the Executive Board permits these Member States to be informed often in advance of the official communication of the work proposed or accomplished by the Organization. The personal contacts which our Information Officer in Paris might establish with the Secretariat, if allowed to take on these additional duties, would also permit the Department to be appraised of any openings calling for experts or specialists in one of UNESCO's several fields of action. You will recall, of course, that since the expiry of Mr. Doré's term of office on the Executive Board, no more link exists between the Department and UNESCO.

One final consideration has to do with the composition of Canadian Delegations to forthcoming sessions of the General Conference. Because delegates are in increasing measure called to attend most, if not all, the meetings of the Commissions and Committees of the General Conference as well as of the several working parties appointed to consider the programme, it is felt that a Canadian Delegation to UNESCO, to be in any way competent must, besides being composed of hard-working people, be of sufficient members to cover all of the work accomplished at the Conference. The ideal delegation would, therefore, comprise 3 delegates, assisted by the same number of alternate delegates, one of whom might be the Information Officer at the Embassy dealing with UNESCO matters. To these would be added a Financial Adviser, the Secretary of a previous delegation as technical adviser, and finally a junior officer from the Department who would act as Secretary to the group.

GOLD; FURTHER EXTENSION OF AID TO MINES

3. The Minister of Finance said that recent requests from the gold mining industry for additional help had taken two forms: (a) that the government permit the export sale of gold at premium prices under a scheme analogous to that now in effect in South Africa and (b) that assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act be calculated on production in excess of 45 or 50 per cent of base year production instead of in excess of 66 2/3 per cent as at present.

Sales at premium prices would be of concern to the International Monetary Fund but it would be difficult for the Fund to refuse permission as long as the arrangement was allowed for South Africa. There was strong evidence that a large part of South African sales went into the "hoarding" markets. The Fund's objection to such sales were principally that they involved a loss of gold to central monetary reserves where the gold could meet the needs of legitimate trade and secondly, that they were in effect exchange transactions at rates different from the agreed parities and constituted a threat to exchange stability. There was doubt as to how much gold could be sold at the premium rates.

The Fund would also be interested in any plan for an increase in direct payments to the gold mines since this would suggest that aid was being established on a more or less permanent basis. The U.S. Treasury was interested in both proposals and wished to be sure there would be discussion with them before any decisions were taken.

An explanatory document was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, undated and attached appendix — Cab. Doc. 46-51.)†

4. Mr. Abbott felt that, if some assistance were considered necessary, the proposal for premium sales seemed to be the one that should be adopted. Any increase in subsidy payments would be only the first of many increases that would have to be made if, as seemed probable, costs continued to rise.

5. The Minister of Trade and Commerce thought the premium sales were not likely to prove of much assistance. If anything effective was to be done it was probable that changes in direct measures of assistance would be necessary.

6. The Cabinet, after considerable discussion, agreed that:

(a) the Assistant to the Governor of the Bank of Canada (Mr. Rasminsky) be authorized to ascertain from the International Monetary Fund whether there would be opposition to action by Canada to permit export sales of gold at premium prices under a scheme analogous to that in effect in South Africa;

(b) he should at the same time inform the U.S. Treasury of the approach the government had in mind making to the International Monetary Fund; and,

(c) further consideration of the desirability of altering the basis of assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act be deferred pending information as to the position of the Fund on premium sales.

REPORT OF WASHINGTON DISCUSSIONS FEBRUARY 15-16, 1951

1. Discussions with U.S.

I met with the U.S. group on Thursday morning, February 15th. Those present on the U.S. side were Willis, Eddy, Smith, Howard and Blaser (Treasury), Margaret and Tamagna (Federal Reserve Board), Corbett and McDiarmid (State) and Hooker (Fund).

I informed them of the decision of the Canadian Government to allow Canadian gold producers access to premium gold markets on the same terms as South African producers and outlined the details of the proposed plan. I reminded them that we had consistently warned that it would be impossible for Canada to resist strong pressure from the industry to be permitted to do whatever the Fund allowed South Africa to do and explained the reasons why this pressure had recently become extremely intense.

There was no disposition on the U.S. side to assert any moral right on the part of the Fund to deny to Canada what was permitted to South Africa, but they made it clear that they viewed the proposed Canadian action with great distaste and that they would greatly prefer to see our government meet the industry's difficulties through increased subsidies. They felt that our action would raise more difficult problems for them than the South African, partly because it would be followed by similar action by most other producers (though not themselves) and partly because such action by Canada, a contiguous country with the same general standards as their own and which had in the past cooperated very closely with the U.S. in these matters, would have a much greater psychological impact than similar action by any other country. They were concerned with the long-run effects on world trade and financial stability of the diversion of current gold production away from central reserves into private hoards. They felt that this Canadian action would give strong support to the movement away from paper currencies into gold; among other things, it would certainly lead to a revival of the demand for internal circulation of gold in the U.S. Coming at this particular time when the U.S. was gearing up its economy for defence purposes, our action would almost inevitably result in unfavourable publicity for Canada in the United States. In particular it would be said that this industry, according to U.S. standards a non-essential one, was being given under the new Canadian arrangements special assistance both through a subsidy and premium sales. Problems might arise if Canada sought to buy gold from the U.S. monetary authorities at the official price while we were permitted sales at premium prices. They were particularly concerned at what the public reaction to our action would be and feared that no matter how carefully we explained it, it would be seized upon by interested parties, including Mr. Havenga, as evidence that Canada had now joined the ranks of South Africa in rejecting the falsity of the official price of gold, in recognizing the legitimacy of the private demands, etc. etc.

The U.S. side made it clear that they would not be in favour of the Fund abandoning its gold policy and authorizing free-for-all access to premium markets.

2. Joint Discussions with U.K. and U.S.

This joint discussion took place in the afternoon of February 15th as a result of a U.S. initiative. The U.K. side was represented by Caine, Rowe-Dutton, Christelow and Crick.

The U.K. too would prefer to see us meet the problem through subsidies and maintained that we could give more effective help to the industry in this way.

In the course of these discussions, I kept coming back to the point that no one had the right to ask Canada to refrain from action which the Fund agreed to or acquiesced in for South Africa. In the afternoon the discussion between the U.S. and U.K. was largely centred on the question whether there should be any change in the arrangements regarding South Africa. They seemed to agree that there was no real hope of getting South Africa to change her actions and they discussed the possibility of the Fund repudiating the agreement with South Africa and declaring that the present South African practice was not in accordance with Fund policy. They wished to know whether the Canadian Government would persist in its proposal if this were done. I said I was unable to reply as the Canadian decision had been based on the existing situation which was that the Fund acquiesced in what South Africa was doing; action along the line indicated would create a new situation which our Government would have to consider.

3. Discussion with U.K. and other Commonwealth

The U.K. said privately that they thought most of the sterling area producers would sell their current output in premium markets if we did. Southern Rhodesia had just asked Whitehall to take this up with the Fund on their behalf and the Colonial office was pressing for similar facilities for the African Colonies. Australia and New Zealand were described as "champing". The U.K. were concerned with the fate of their arrangements under which sterling area gold production (ex South Africa) was sold to them and would need time to work out substitute arrangements.

The South Africa gold sales at premium prices had recently been so large that the agreed gold payments to the U.K. were being made in U.S. dollars.

I told Garland, the Australian alternate director, what was intended and authorized him to inform the South Africans privately. I also told Joshi, the Indian director, who wished to know whether we would give the same undertaking as the South Africans had given to "scrutinize all sales and exercise discretion having in mind the quantities and the direction of the sales". He indicated that while he thought the Fund could not deny us what was granted to South Africa, the terms would have to be exactly the same. When the U.S. raised the same question, I replied that I was sure we would find no difficulty in agreeing to exercise the same degree of discretion as South Africa. Joshi, however, seemed to regard this as far from satisfactory.

4. Discussions with Fund Staff

These discussions, on February 16th, covered much the same ground as those with the U.S. and U.K. They realize that the Fund is in a mess on this gold policy and that its acquiescence in the South African arrangement is largely responsible. They have no hope of changing South African actions but are now tempted to improve the Fund's position by withdrawing their acquiescence.

They believe that if our Government's concern is to help the industry, the method selected is not an effective one. The gold in premium markets passes through so many hands before coming to rest that only a portion of the apparent premium reaches the pocket of the producer. For example, they quoted from the Annual Report of Consolidated Gold Fields of South Africa Ltd. to the effect that the average premium on the 1,500,000 ounces of South African gold sold in the year ended June 30th, 1950 was $3.50 per ounce. The bulk of these sales took place in the latter half of 1949 when the premium over the official price of gold ranged from $5 to $15 per ounce. The report says that demand diminished in the first half of 1950 and increased again in the three months to September 30th "but at a substantially lower premium".

The view of the staff is that a general break-down of the Fund's policy will result not only in newly mined gold going into hoards but also substantial amounts out of official reserves, with serious consequences for the future.

I undertook to communicate to the Canadian Government the views that had been expressed. The U.K. and U.S. requested that Fund consideration be deferred until Friday, February 23rd, and I reluctantly agreed to this delay. The Fund staff is awaiting word from me before placing the matter formally on the agenda and circulating a paper.

Note de l'adjoint éxécutif du gouverneur de la Banque du Canada

Memorandum by Executive Assistant to Governor of Bank of Canada

[Ottawa], March 30, 1951

GOLD SALES AT PREMIUM PRICES
REPORT OF WASHINGTON DISCUSSIONS FEBRUARY 21-MARCH 9, 1951

1. This note should be read in conjunction with the memorandum of February 19, 1951 reporting the Washington discussions of February 15-16.

2. At the conclusion of those discussions Mr. Martin, then Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, phoned the Minister of Finance and reiterated the strong hope of the U.S. administration that we would find it possible to continue to keep our gold production out of premium markets. Mr. Abbott said he was waiting for my report and would have the U.S. difficulties in mind when deciding what action to take.

3. When the report was considered, the Minister came to the conclusion that however valid might be the misgivings expressed regarding the effect of our proposed action on Fund policy and on U.S. and U.K. interests, the points which had been raised did not enable him to face the Canadian gold-mining industry and explain to them why they should be denied facilities which South African producers enjoyed with the apparent approval of the Fund. Accordingly, he instructed me to place the matter on the Fund agenda. I phoned Overby and told him that the Minister continued to attach great importance to the Fund and was prepared to collaborate with the Fund in enforcing its policies in every practical way. However in view of the fact that we were proposing to do no more than the Fund was acquiescing in in the case of South Africa, he did not feel that this question arose. I therefore requested him to communicate the following to the Executive Board: "The Canadian Government has informed the Fund that it wishes to consult with it regarding its desire to allow Canadian gold producers access to the premium markets for semi-processed and fully manufactured gold on the same terms and conditions as those applied by South Africa pursuant to its arrangement with the Fund". I also requested Overby to circulate to the Executive Board the outline of a Plan for the Export of Gold at Premium Prices, copy†of which is annexed hereto.

4. Overby requested time for the Staff to consider the situation I agreed to this. He phoned me later that day (Feb. 19) and said that the Staff would express the following views when our proposed action was considered by the Board:

(a) The Fund gold policy is still in existence and the Staff cannot recommend any action inconsistent with it.

(b) The Staff believes that South African practices have not been consistent with the spirit and clear intention of the Fund policy and has been in process of re-examining the working of the arrangement. Negotiations have not yet been re-opened because it is only recently that the Fund has had official knowledge of the great increase in South African sales. In any case the Staff could not recommend that minimal compliance in its policies by one member should set the standard for all members.

(c) The Staff feels that agreement with the Canadian proposal would be tantamount to undermining the Fund policy. It would become even more difficult to enforce the policy. Therefore the Staff would not recommend agreement to the Board even if the Canadian proposal were in every respect similar to the South African.

(d) If the Board is in any case disposed to accept the Canadian proposal, the Staff must point out that this will nullify the Fund's gold policy and Canada and all other members should realize the implications.

(e) Acceptance of the Canadian proposal would be tantamount to approval of the South African practices. Hitherto the Fund has not acquiesced in these.

(f) Since the problem raised is to make the Fund policy more effective in practice, the Board should consider arranging a meeting of the main producers and importers.

(g) In view of the foregoing it is suggested that Canada defer its proposed action.

5. Overby went on to request that we should not proceed with the proposed consultation with the Fund at least until the Staff had an opportunity to place the South African situation before the Board; he indicated that the Staff would propose to the Board that they find that the South African practices were not consistent with the Fund's gold policy. After consulting the Minister, I phoned Overby and reminded him of our past record of co-operation in this matter, and said we were still willing to co-operate if the Fund really meant business and was not merely looking for delay in the hope that the pressures would wear down. The Fund would have to give a real lead and not get bogged down in delays and technicalities. If the Fund really was prepared to act realistically and come to a clear-cut decision we would accede to his request and not place the matter on the agenda for the time being. We would of course expect that a finding by the Fund that South African practices were not in accord with Fund policy would be followed by a serious effort on the part of the Fund to work out an enforceable policy.

6. On my return to Washington discussions with U.S. and U.K. officials were resumed. These now centred around the action that would be taken in the Fund. There emerged a proposal for a three point resolution which would (1) re-affirm the Fund's gold policy, (2) appeal to members for cooperation and instruct the Staff to try to work out with members a more effective policy and one which commanded more general compliance, and (3) find that South African practices were inconsistent with the Fund's policy. In the course of these discussions I took the position that I would cooperate in drafting points (1) and (2) and would support these parts of the resolution in the Board, but that I would take no part in drafting point (3) and that I would abstain in any vote on this in the Board. My reason for this was that I did not wish to place Canada in the position of appearing to be asking for a Fund condemnation of South Africa as the price for our not following her example. I also made it clear throughout that we were vitally concerned with the substantive action that the Fund and the important members of the Fund who were keen on the policy

(U.S. and U.K.) were going to take to work out a more effective gold policy. The following draft resolution was worked out for submission to the Board.

> The International Monetary Fund's policy on international premium gold transactions was established in June, 1947. At that time the Fund found that such transactions tended to undermine exchange stability and to involve an undesirable loss to monetary reserves by division to Boards. The Fund statement of policy issued at that time strongly deprecated international transactions in gold at premium prices and recommended that all of its members take effective action to prevent such transactions in gold with other countries or with the nationals of other countries. The Fund policy was reviewed and reaffirmed by the Executive Board in April, 1950.
>
> It is the firm belief of the Executive Board that in the present conditions of world uncertainty there is even greater need to conserve gold for official monetary reserves. Therefore, the Fund appeals to all members to cooperate in the pursuit of the objectives of the policy announced in June, 1947.
>
> The Executive Board of the International Monetary Fund has completed a review of international gold transactions. It has been determined that in the last year, particularly in the second half of 1950, there has been a large increase in the volume of international transactions in gold at premium prices and a related decline in the net amount of world gold production entering into official monetary reserves. In view of this the Managing Director of the Fund is authorized to consult urgently with member countries with a view to making the Fund's policy more effective.
>
> In this connection it will be recalled that in May, 1949, the Fund decided to raise no objection to proposals by South Africa for the sale of semi-processed gold abroad for industrial and artistic uses at prices in excess of monetary parity, it being understood that discretion would be exercised with respect to the quantities and direction of such sales. The Fund at the time reserved the right to reopen discussion of this matter if the amounts involved appeared to be excessive.
> According to recent information sales of gold by South Africa at premium prices in the latter months of 1950 amount to between 40% and 50% of its new gold production. The Board considers that sales on this scale clearly exceed what is required for the arts and industries and can no longer be regarded as being within the spirit and purpose of the understanding reached by the Fund with South Africa in May, 1949, or as being consonant with the Fund's gold policy. In these circumstances the Fund regrets that it can no longer maintain the attitude that it took to the South African arrangements in May, 1949. The Executive Board accordingly requests the Managing Director to consult with South Africa in accordance with the general direction to enter into consultations with member countries in a previous paragraphs of this resolution.

As indicated above I refused to participate in the drafting of the section on South Africa or to comment on it and informed the U.S. and U.K. that I would abstain in any vote on it in the Board.

At the conclusion of these discussions I was instructed by Ottawa to inform the U.S. and U.K. that we would support all parts of the resolution in the Board and that if the resolution was passed the Minister would not proceed with the plan to allow Canadian gold producers access to premium markets. It was made clear that this decision was postulated on the expectation that a serious attempt would urgently be made to develop an effective Fund policy which is generally adhered to. We of course reserved our right to do what is ultimately permitted by the Fund to any other member under such a policy. If, after a reasonable period of time (which, under questioning, I said would have to be measured in terms of weeks rather than months) it became apparent that an effective gold policy was not being developed, we reserved our right to reconsider our whole position. I also was instructed to indicate that it was not intended to increase the subsidy for the time being, but that the subsidy would probably be increased if, after a period of time it became apparent that good progress was being made to implement Fund policy on premium sales or if, notwithstanding the failure to make such progress, Canada decided to continue to stand behind the Fund policy.

7. The discussions in the Fund Board were, from our point of view, not very satisfactory. It must be recalled that the Fund's policy deprecating international gold transactions at premium prices is not supported by all the Executive Directors — many of the European directors disapprove of the policy and some of them as well as the Latin American directors represent countries which more or less openly flout the policy. Moreover the legal basis of the policy has never been clarified: the policy itself is only an expression of views and an appeal for cooperation, but Fund officials have frequently talked and acted as though the transactions in question were specifically prohibited in the Articles of Agreement and this has aroused resentment on the part of the Directors who disagree with the policy.

In the Fund discussions the U.S. and U.K. displayed much less force and enthusiasm than they had brought to bear in persuading us not to go in for premium sales. The U.S. was weakly represented by their Alternate Director in the absence of Southard, and the U.K. clearly had no taste for the task of condemning South Africa (though in fairness it should be stated that they gave a more effective account of themselves than the U.S.). For my part, I did not wish, for obvious reasons, to take a leading part in the discussion. (Annexed hereto are the Board minutes of my principal observations.) In consequences there was a notable discrepancy between the strength of the resolution put forward by the U.S. and the weakness of the case made to support it. On the other hand, the Australian Melville made a very able statement on behalf of South Africa, which did not lose in effectiveness so far as the Board was concerned by the fact that it failed to address itself to the main question whether the South African practices were or were not consistent with the Fund's gold policy. Many of the other directors were genuinely reluctant to "name" South Africa in terms as direct as those used in the draft resolution; some, of course, took this position because they disliked the policy or merely wished to create embarrassment.

The upshot of this situation was an amendment to the U.S. resolution moved by Saad, the Egyptian director, to substitute for the whole of the resolution the following:

"Since the amount of sales and purchases in the world markets of gold for jewelry and other artistic and industrial purposes has recently been increasing at a great rate, indicating that at least a part of it finds its way to private hoards, contrary to the policy of the Fund, the Board considers the existing arrangements and practices of several countries, including the South African arrangements are no longer a satisfactory basis to implement the Fund's gold policy and requests the staff to elaborate, after consultation with the countries concerned, more effective methods than the existing ones."

The Saad amendment was defeated, but the only countries opposing it were the U.S., U.K., and Canada. India and China abstained, and support came from Egypt, Mexico, Brazil, France, Netherlands, Belgium, Italy, Yugoslavia and Australia. I then asked for an adjournment to enable me to return to Ottawa for consultation; I was disturbed not only by the narrowness of the opposition to the Saad amendment but by the danger that it might be claimed that Canada was insisting on strong language with regard to South Africa as the price for our own good behavior. Here we considered with the Minister the various alternatives and it was decided that in all the circumstances the best course was to support the Saad resolution. The U.S. and U.K. were informed of this decision and agreed with it; they were also informed of our intention to increase the gold subsidy.

Saad re-introduced his resolution, with the grammar somewhat improved, and I made a statement which is reported in the Board minutes as follows:

"Mr. Rasminsky said he appreciated the Board's willingness to postpone consideration for a short time. At the earlier meetings he had been disturbed at what had appeared to be some misunderstanding of Canada's position in the present discussions. He stated again the position he had outlined at EB Mtg. 642 (Item 2, 3/1/51). He added that Canada had no special interest in seeing any particular form of words, but did believe that the Fund would want to make its position sufficiently clear to let members know whether certain actions were or were not in conformity with the Fund's gold policy. He had also been particularly disturbed at the narrow basis on which Mr. Saad's amendment had been defeated at EB Mtg. 643 (Item 1, 3/3/51). Canada had always felt that the Fund should strive to avoid decisions not having broad support and situations where weighted voting strength was used to override the strong and sincerely held convictions of important minorities. Accordingly, since the earlier vote had shown that the majority of Directors preferred a form of language along the lines which Mr. Saad had advanced, he was prepared to support Mr. Saad's proposal now before the Board."

This statement was received quite warmly by the Board and several of the directors echoed the sentiments regarding decisions based exclusively on weighted voting. The resolution was then adopted, with only France opposing.

8. A couple of days later the Board approved, without great difficulty, the increase in our gold subsidy. On this occasion I informed the Board of the decision of the Government not to proceed, for the time being at least, with the project of authorizing the Canadian gold industry to make gold sales at premium prices.

9. In the course of the various conversations with U.S. officials, including one with Martin, I made it clear that the problem we were discussing would remain a source of frustration and vexation until the premium on gold was eliminated. I expressed the personal view that this could only be accomplished through a radical approach, i.e. make the U.S. dollar convertible by satisfying the hoarding demand at the official price and/or raising the official price to a level where official demand can compete effectively with private demand. The U.S. officials were not disposed to dispute this observation but they showed no inclination to follow either of the courses of action indicated. They were opposed to the first, the reasons adduced being partly unwillingness to lose the gold, partly a belief that the distinction between the monetary and non-monetary use of gold was vital to maintain public support for a gold-buying policy, partly an unwillingness to have Congressional hearings that would focus public attention on the problem of inflation and the lack of confidence in the U.S. dollar. This last reason was also the principal one mentioned for being unwilling to raise the official price of gold, though the case was also made that this would be inflationary in the U.S. and abroad at a time when deflationary policies are called for.

FUND GOLD POLICY AND SALES OF SEMI-PROCESSED GOLD

Position of Canada

Mr. Rasminsky said that he could agree with much of what Mr. Melville had said in his statement at EB Mtg. 641 (Item 1, 2/28/51) on the policy of the Fund in developing world circumstances. He could agree that no satisfactory solutions for the long run would probably be found except through either satisfying the private demand at the official price or enabling official purchasing to compete on a price basis with private hoarding demand. He also agreed that a policy which threw varying degrees of burden on different members, depending on their willingness to co-operate, was unsatisfactory. It was clear that the real burden of any enforcement had fallen and would continue to fall mainly on those gold producing members which observed the Fund's policy. Canada had so far scrupulously adhered to that line, but it had given clear warning that the Fund could not expect compliance by some member countries if others did not comply. The statement of the representative of Canada at EB Mtg. 432 (Items 2, 5/6/49) set forth that position fully. Canadian representatives had, he believed, made it amply clear that Canada would have no special basis for denying its miners access to premium markets on grounds of Fund policy if other important producers were permitted access to these markets. In this respect there were reasons for giving special attention to the practices of South Africa. As the major producer of gold in the world, its actions were naturally of a different order of importance than those of small producers. Moreover, and more important, South Africa was the only country selling gold at premium prices under a special arrangement with the Fund. In consequence it was inevitable that South African practices should be regarded by the gold mining industry of other countries as being acceptable to the Fund. No country could reasonably be expected, as a matter of co-operation with the Fund, to prevent its industry from engaging in practices which the Fund itself found acceptable.

In those circumstances, Canada had concluded in recent weeks that its gold producers should have the right to sell in premium markets the same as South Africa's. He had been asked to begin consultations with the Fund. The Management of the Fund had expressed disturbance at the developing scope of premium sales and indicated that recent information on South African sales made it questionable whether that country's action could be regarded as being consistent with Fund policy. In those circumstances the Management had asked that Canada hold off its decision in order to permit bringing the question of South Africa to the Executive Board. Canada had agreed. The question before the Board was whether recent South African practices were in accord with the Fund's gold policy. The Fund would, of course, have to generalize any conclusions reached. As South Africa was, according to the staff, selling 40 to 50 per cent of its current production in premium markets, the question was whether it was consistent with the Fund's policy for this proportion of new gold production to go into premium markets. A proposal along these lines had been put forward by South Africa last year and defeated. In conclusion, he remarked that a policy having widely varying degrees of compliance would necessarily remain a source of great difficulty. If the Fund should decide to reaffirm its policy and seek greater compliance, then he believed the staff and Fund members should regard it as a matter of utmost urgency to consult members and try to work out an effective policy for general compliance.

There was agreement the discussion would be continued the following day.

PERSONAL Rome, December 11, 1951

Dear Wynne [Plumptre],

Thank you for your note. I too am sorry we did not meet in Rome. I tried to phone you a couple of times but "Plumptre" proved too large and unfamiliar a mouthful for the operator — and as I knew you were very much pre-occupied with NATO problems and people I did not wait at your doorstep.

My stay in Rome has, I think, been quite useful. The items I had to look after on the agenda — concerning constitutional and legal matters — were not overly important, but I have had a chance to look over the organization here and reform or reaffirm my opinions about it and the Canadian interest in it.

About the usefulness of the FAO in general there can be no doubt at all. The need for it is obvious and I am convinced that it is doing really important practical work in a large number of countries. I am equally certain that the efficiency or usefulness of the work is not uniform but a sure indication of its value is the keen interest which delegations of underdeveloped countries are showing in the activities of the Organization and their desire to become members of the Council. The significant fact is that countries for whom something of real practical importance has already been done are the most interested. I am attaching a copy of "The Work of FAO 1950-51" — The Director General's Report.† This year the report is exceptionally good and gives a fairly broad but specific description of the work of the Organization. I think it should be distributed as widely as possible.

On the negative side I should mention the Organization's long and inefficient Administrative Tail. It is reported to be slightly better than some of the other Agencies, but it is certainly using funds which could better be employed in the technical divisions. Likewise in talking to the Personnel of the Secretariat I was very much impressed (particularly but not entirely in the lower grades) with their preoccupation with their salaries and allowances which are much above the Roman Standard. Many of them have no sympathy with or feeling for the people they are devoting their lives to help. As a general principle I think this is bad and shows a lack on somebody's part in the Organization.

It is of course impossible for me to judge how much money is wasted by the Organization. In the Budget Committee, Alan Hockin did very good work in systematically questioning large and small items (and I must admit the representative of the D.G. had good answers at his finger tips). I suspect however that there is a good deal of water and waste in many of the figures.

Out of all this comes the general impression of an organization which, after five years of gestation, is on the point of doing increasingly useful work on a relatively small Budget ($5,250,000). Its senior officials seem relatively competent and its general administration not much worse than might be expected and better than some similar Organizations.

The FAO Conference normally functions in three Commissions. The first considers the world outlook for Agriculture, etc. and points up general programs; the second, composed of technical people, studies the individual projects in the program of work for the next two years; the third discusses the Budget and other financial, legal and constitutional issues.

I have given a good deal of thought to the size and composition of our delegation, and this of course raises the question of the Government's interest in the Organization. Canada receives practically no material services from FAO except the usual statistical information. Consequently we have little to gain materially from our contribution or from large representation at Conferences. On the other hand, I cannot express too strongly the feeling of good will for Canada that is felt by all delegations and, I think, the Secretariat. This is due very largely to Dr. Barton and of course in the past to Mr. Pearson. Dr. Barton is extremely well liked and his judgment is highly valued. It is certain that his retirement will leave a very noticeable gap in the Council and Conference and an even greater one on the Canadian Delegation. In addition Alan Hockin has done an exceptionally able and respected job in the Budget Committee and in Commission III and is one of the outstanding representatives on those bodies. A recognition of this is his appointment by the Council to the FAO Committee on Financial Control. Also Dr. Pett has taken a very useful and active part in the Nutrition Panel. In addition we have provided some very good people to the Secretariat, i.e. Dr. Finn and Dr. Archibald.

This element of good will and respect for Canada is well worth maintaining, and in my opinion the only way to maintain it is to send first rate delegates to FAO meetings. This brings up the question of the size of the Delegation to the Conference. As a general principle — in view of the foregoing — my opinion is that the size of the delegation should be directly proportional to its quality. If first class people are available and can be spared, then it is certainly worth sending a large delegation. If some of our good representatives are well known and their ability appreciated in FAO, then they are certain to have extra duties given to them. If our broad interests in the objectives of FAO are accepted I think it is well worth the expense involved to send such people to Rome every two years. On the other hand if mediocre people are sent — people who take little or ineffective part in the debates and who make no great effort to appreciate the problems of the Organization and who do not make a point of getting to know the secretariat, then it is really not worth sending them.

The minimum requirement for full representation is as follows:

Commission I	Head of Delegation
Commission II	One delegate
	Second week of conference
	Agriculture Panel	One technical expert
	Forestry Panel	One technical expert
	Nutrition Panel	One technical expert
	Economics & Statistics Panel	One technical expert
	Fisheries Panel	One technical expert
Commission III	One delegate

This gives a total of eight, of which four are really needed only in the second week when the Panels are sitting. In addition it is useful to have a secretary — but it is not important to have a stenographer as services can always be had from the Secretariat or from the Embassy, and indeed they are not required in quantity. The secretary should be able to take some part in the meetings and might be a junior in training for FAO work.

The problem of sending a delegation to a Conference will not arise again until November 1953, but at the moment it is difficult to think of an adequate replacement for Dr. Barton. I do not think either Hudson or Trueman will ever be capable of filling his shoes, but there does not seem to be anyone else on the horizon in the Department of Agriculture at present.

The more urgent question is — who will represent us on the Council? I do not think either Hudson or Trueman will be able to make much of a contribution but I have heard no other names mentioned. Dr. Barton will probably speak to you about this when he gets back.

I might say a word or two about the Organization for the Conference. As you may know this is the first year that there has been any attempt at coordinating and approving instructions and, even so, the task was done inadequately. For example, the Department of Fisheries, which did not send a representative to the Delegation, sent only a paragraph of instructions and Shirley MacDonald, who represented us on the Fisheries Panel, was consequently able to make a less valuable contribution than he might otherwise have done. I have suggested, and Dr. Barton agreed, that a report should be prepared on the Conference and he instructed all delegates to prepare short reports on the parts of the agenda with which they were concerned. Unfortunately all except Dr. Pett have left the Conference without providing the Secretary with these reports — but they may be forthcoming in Ottawa. (I have sent you a number of despatches on the Legal and Constitutional issues and Dr. Barton has copies of these). You may wish to have someone follow this up in order to establish the precedent.

I am convinced that the lack of Reports in the past, while annoying, has not affected our representation because of the abilities of Dr. Barton and Alan Hockin. In future, however, I think we should keep a much closer watch on FAO matters.

I have had several talks with Dr. Barton and Claude Hudson about the FAO committee in Ottawa and, I think, have impressed them with the desirability of keeping closer contact with External Affairs and of organizing and administering the committee more efficiently. Unfortunately however I am afraid they lack a feeling for the separation of tasks and the administrative responsibilities of their Department. I have made them well aware of our difficulties: staffing, etc. But I wonder whether it would not be possible for the Head of the U.N. Division or some senior person to made a point of seeing Hudson, or whoever is chairman of the FAO Committee, before Council meetings (or better still — every few months) and take a closer interest in what he is doing.

Another point. Dr. Barton has told me that he has had some useful talks on technical assistance with the Indians and other delegations from underdeveloped areas. I suggested that our UNTA people would be very interested to talk to him about it. Perhaps you might like to suggest that they call him, when he gets back to Ottawa. I was surprised to hear that Mr. Cavell had not seen him.

I am sorry this has been such a long letter, but I hope some of it may be useful to you as a personal impression. Please remember me kindly to Beryl and all in the Division. Best wishes for a good Christmas Season.

FRANK HOOTON

P.S. Thank you also for your messages from Paris and Cambridge.[11] I should like to go to C. and will certainly look him up.

P.P.S. I have told Dr. Barton about this letter and about my impressions of most of the subjects I have mentioned.

III. RAW MATERIALS; INTERNATIONAL DISCUSSIONS AND ARRANGEMENTS

8. Mr. Beaupré said that plans for international discussions on raw materials were still obscure and somewhat confusing. Both O.E.E.C. and N.A.T.O. had concerned themselves originally with raw materials but their discussions and plans had been superseded by the arrangement made between Mr. Truman and Mr. Attlee in Washington. The plan for a central body on raw materials was also somewhat uncertain. The United Kingdom favoured tripartite membership (the United States, United Kingdom and France) while the United States favoured a rather larger membership. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce had indicated, informally, that he thought Canada was inclined to favour the U.K. approach since any enlargement of the central body would make it very difficult to place a limit on membership and also since any attempt at "area" representation by one or two countries from any given area would be unrealistic. It was understood that under the plan the central body should be responsible for selecting the commodities to be considered and for determining the countries that should be invited to participate in each commodity discussion. There had already been an invitation to participate in a discussion on rubber. Determination of countries to participate in commodity discussion might give rise to difficulty. It was understood that Canada was not on the list of countries to discuss molybdenum, cobalt, wood and tin although we had an interest in each. Canada was on the list of countries to participate in discussions on copper and sulphur. Word had been sent to the Embassy in Washington that Canada would wish to be represented in discussions on all commodities of which it was an importer.

It was not at all clear how the commodity discussions would proceed, including that on rubber. There was some indication that the United States would like an arrangement which would keep rubber from the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries. It was not clear, however, what adequate inducement to the producing countries there would be. Possible proposals in relation to rubber were of special concern since it was the first commodity to be dealt with and might provide a pattern for future arrangements.

9. The Chairman said that it seemed doubtful whether a commodity discussion on rubber enabled the right approach in existing circumstances. Because of the character and location of the principal producing countries major questions of East-West policy, which were now in a state of precarious balance, would be to a large extent involved. If one hope was that an arrangement might be concluded which would keep rubber from going to the U.S.S.R. and satellite countries, it had to be considered that the producing countries were in a very weak position both politically and economically. If the economic interest of the producers were clear they would still have to hedge because of political considerations. However, it was not at all certain that they would consider their economic interests best served by an overall plan that in part aimed at holding down the price of rubber.

It did not look as though it would be possible to achieve a plan for international allocation along the lines of the Wheat Agreement. It might be possible to do something if the approach were rather similar to the wartime arrangement for sugar — that is, if the United States and United Kingdom or either took up the bulk of the exportable surplus with arrangements for resale. If there were plans for bulk contracts of fairly long duration there might be a real incentive to the producing countries.

It was possible that the plans should be looked at in relation to the Colombo Plan for economic development. The primary objective of the Plan was political — to keep the countries from going to pieces in the next few years. It might be sensible to have a plan for rubber under which there would be bulk purchasing combined with assurances that consumer goods and capital equipment would be made available to the producing countries. They did not wish to accumulate sterling balances and some guarantee of a flow of actual goods would be necessary. On the other hand it might make action under the Colombo Plan easier for the contributing countries if it could be linked into a specific and immediate interest of the kind that would be apparent if there were a tie to raw material deliveries from the Asian countries.

10. Mr. Beaupré said it was difficult to see how any attempt at international allocation machinery through the commodity discussions could be made to work. With restricted membership in the discussions, many countries would feel badly left out and there was likely to be quite a bit of ill feeling. It might be possible to get participating countries to work toward comparable restrictions on their own use of materials but as to allocation the outcome of the tin conference had shown how difficult it would be to reach an arrangement.

11. The Deputy Minister of Finance said there might be some value in the discussions simply for consultation. They might provide a means by which there could be more coherent arrangements under which individual countries' contracts for future supplies could be entered into. It was difficult, however, to see any specific allocation machinery working.

12. The Governor of the Bank of Canada said that it would not in all cases be satisfactory for Canada to have the United Kingdom and the United States acting together or separately as principal buyers. So far as the United Kingdom was concerned, it appeared that its present position had been made more difficult by continuation too long of restrictions on raw material purchases in an effort to build up gold and dollar balances. In effect, the United Kingdom had run down its commodity reserves in an effort to improve its financial reserves. In the change of circumstances, it was the commodity reserve that was the more important. U.K. policy should have changed over in June and failure to make the alteration had cost the United Kingdom very dearly.

13. The Committee noted the report on international arrangements and discussions concerning raw materials.

TELEGRAM WA-415 Washington, February 1, 1951

Following for M.W. Mackenzie, Deputy Minister, Department of Trade and Commerce, Ottawa, Canada, from John H. English, Begins: Please pass a copy to Mr. Plumptre, reference our form despatch 310, of January 24th.†

2. Further to my confidential letter of January 23rd,† reference Raw Materials Committees, I was informed at a meeting this morning by John Evans of State Department that, contrary to our original impression, State Department is proceeding with the idea of enlarging the international raw materials group of three although no agreement to do so has yet been reached with the British or the French. When we mentioned to State Department that the enlargement of the Central Committee was completely contrary to the impression we had gained in Thorp's office, and in our opinion would only tend to complicate the problem and make it more difficult, Evans said that he regretted there had been a misunderstanding and that while it is correct that the United States had agreed to restrict the Central Committee to three, this was an interim measure for the purpose of meeting British objection and of getting the commodity committee operating at as early a date as possible. He said that the United States had never given up the idea that the Main Committee should not be enlarged and he further added that they had been strongly pressed in this view by a large number of requests from small countries wishing representation on the central group. These countries apparently feel that it is important to be represented on the Central Committee in order to exert their influence respecting the commodities to be studied and to ensure adequate and appropriate consideration by the commodity committees themselves. It is evident from a subsequent conversation with Rowan of the British Embassy that the British are by no means sold on this question of enlargement of the Central Committee and in his own words "they have not and would not agree". Meanwhile the United States are apparently undecided whether individual countries should be invited to join the central group or whether representation should be arranged through international organizations such as O.E.E.C. for the smaller European countries and so on. Already the Latin American countries have taken the matter in their own hands and (without being invited to do so) have nominated one representative for that group. Evans expressed the hope that South East Asia and the British Commonwealth might similarly be able to have group representatives although he recognized the problem, especially with respect to South East Asia.

3. We reiterated the Canadian view that a small Central Committee of three is much to be desired and that we thought that any enlargement would simply lead to an unwieldy committee and would increase the overall problems without giving any important advantage.

4. As regards the Central Committee, Evans said that agreement has now been reached respecting the commodity committees to be set up immediately, and those countries to be invited to serve on these committees. He said the list was not being published at the present time but had been given to us for our confidential advice. The agreed commodities and those to be invited to serve on them are as follows:

COMMODITY	COUNTRIES
Copper-zinc-lead	U.S., U.K., France, Canada, Chile, Belgium, Germany, Mexico, Australia, Peru, Italy, Norway
Tin	U.S., U.K., France, India, Belgium, Neth., Bolivia, Indonesia, and Thailand
Wool	U.S., U.K., France, Germany, Australia, N.Z., So. Africa, Argentina, Belgium, Italy, Uruguay
Cotton (including linters and long staple)	U.S., U.K., France, Canada, Brazil, Mexico, India, Pakistan, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Egypt, and Peru
Sulphur	U.S., U.K., France, Canada, Australia, N.Z., Belgium, Italy, Brazil, Switzerland, So. Africa
Tungsten-molybdenum	U.S., U.K., France, Portugal, Bolivia, Sweden, Burma, Australia, Brazil, Spain, Chile, Germany
Nickel-cobalt-manganese	U.S., U.K., France, So. Africa, Cuba, Germany, Belgium, Canada, India, Brazil, Norway.

5. The Tin Committee is not being called at present until it is determined what attitude Indonesia displays at the Rubber Committee which is shortly to meet in London.

6. It is proposed to send out invitations this week to all commodity committee members and to request answers within ten days. The first committees are to be convened in Washington about three weeks thereafter, say about the end of February.

7. In the commodity committees it is proposed to limit attendance at meetings to one delegate representing each member country, together with an alternate who would presumably be a commodity technician. The alternate or technical representative might, of course, be different at each commodity meeting, depending on the nature of the agenda.

8. As you are aware, Canada is being invited to become a member in the commodity committees to study copper-zinc-lead; cotton; sulphur; and nickel-cobalt-manganese. With respect to the nickel-cobalt-manganese, State Department would appreciate having from us immediately (A) Any comments we may care to offer respecting the countries to be invited as members of this committee, and (B) Whether we will be prepared to accept membership on the committee. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 1, 1951

Dear Mr. English:

Thank you for your letter of January 23rd† concerning U.S. thinking in connection with the proposed international commodity groups. There appears to be considerable confusion in this particular field at the present time. For example, a month or six weeks ago a representative from the U.S. Embassy called on Wynne Plumptre to ask whether or not Canada would be prepared to accept an invitation to a rubber conference. I was with Wynne during these discussions and we agreed that we would be prepared to accept such an invitation. At the same time Kilcoin, who was the representative from the U.S. Embassy, gave us a list of countries that they proposed to invite.

A week or ten days ago, however, we received an invitation from the British asking us to attend a rubber meeting in London on February 5th and they also advised us of the other countries being invited. We found that the U.K. list varies from the U.S. list.

Finally, in the attachment to your letter under reference, the Americans indicate the countries that they felt should be invited to a rubber conference and, behold, Canada is not included despite the fact that we are in the process of briefing our team for the London meetings next Monday.

In examining the other tentative recommendations for representation on commodity committees we note the committees on which we were included and we are prepared to accept invitations if and when invited. On the other hand, forgetting the rubber committee, we find that we have not been included on the tungsten and molybdenum committee, the tin committee and the wool committee. Naturally as claimants of these commodities our first reaction is to agitate for membership on these committees.

On the other hand, we realize that if these commodity groups are going to be given any chance for success (and it is my personal belief that such chances are limited) it is obviously desirable to keep the number of countries participating to a minimum. However, I do not think that we can afford to be boy scouts in this effort and I think that we should request membership on those committees in which we have not been included and let the central group be responsible for proving to us why we should not receive such invitations.

I might say that I have discussed this subject in general terms with the Minister and it is his feeling that at least for the non-ferrous metals commodity discussions we should look to George Bateman as our representative. So far we have not approached him officially in this regard but I expect that there is little question that he will take on the job if Mr. Howe requests it.

I might also mention that Hampshire of the U.K. High Commissioner's Office here in Ottawa has approached Wynne Plumptre's Division in order to ascertain whether or not we are interested in participating in certain commodity committees. We are not quite sure of the intentions of our various suitors but are doing our best to be prudent.

Yours sincerely,
T.N. BEAUPRÉ

Memorandum from Head, Economic Division, to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], February 19, 1951

RAW MATERIALS — MEETINGS IN WASHINGTON

You may wish to have a word with Mr. Wrong on this subject while he is here.[12]

2. The Central Group under United States, United Kingdom and France is now getting going although final agreement has not yet been reached as to whether other countries shall be added.

3. Despite this disagreement invitations have been issued to many countries to attend half a dozen meetings on different commodities. These meetings will begin early in March and go on "indefinitely". Canada is accepting membership in four groups.

4. The invitation that we received (from the United States Embassy here) put forward the rules that were to govern the groups. Amongst other things it was proposed that each country should be represented on each commodity group by not more than two men: a general policy man and an expert adviser. The former would presumably represent his country on most or all of the commodity groups; the expert adviser would be different for different commodities.

5. Stanley Allen of Trade and Commerce tells me that he has been named by Mackenzie as the general policy man. Carson, an assistant to English in Washington, will be available to alternate for Allen as policy man if a second person of this

[12] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Miss Rae Please see that Mr. Wrong sees this. We can have a word about it later A.D.P.H[eeney]. Feb 21 type is needed. In addition experts in particular commodities will be sent to Washington as they are needed.

6. This is fine — except that our Department has a very active interest in these matters. The raw materials under consideration come from different sorts of countries all over the world; all sorts of political issues are raised — indeed they are likely often to be dominant. In the case of rubber a meeting has already been started in London and it has bogged down as much on political issues as on economic. In this case Trade and Commerce suggested that [A.E.] Ritchie of our Department should work with their man in London, Guy Smith, who is Canada's chief representative. This arrangement has, I think, worked very well.

7. Unfortunately we cannot make the same arrangements in Washington partly because we have not got anyone like Ritchie on the staff of our Embassy there and partly because the proposed rules for the commodity meetings allow for only one policy man and one expert.

8. Allen has asked me to attend a meeting with him later this week to discuss the whole situation and I have welcomed an opportunity of doing so. I have great confidence in his good judgment and sense of cooperation.

9. My chief worry in the present situation is that Allen will be taking his instructions primarily from Denis Harvey. I am not sure that any political guidance we may have to offer will get through in the form in which we put it forward. Denis has a habit of seeing things through a glass darkly.[13] Further, he is at present rather prone to be the "little Canadian", looking after our commercial interests pretty carefully and tossing aside proposals for international control or regulation as completely visionary and impractical.

10. Hence I would rather like to be able to establish, through our Embassy in Washington, a direct contact with Allen. Could we so arrange things that on broad matters of policy Allen took his instructions from Mr. Wrong, or will Mr. Wrong be too busy to concern himself with these matters?

11. I feel pretty sure that Allen himself would welcome the suggestion I have made above, but would Mr. Wrong?[14]

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 21, 1951

Dear Mr. Mackenzie:

There are growing evidences of shortages of newsprint in various parts of the world. In recent months we have had, I am sure, nearly a dozen enquiries from various governments about the possibility of Canadian Government assistance in supplying newsprint. No doubt you have had many more enquiries. The Government of France is now officially on record as favouring international measures to deal with the pulp and paper situation and the British Government is on record as supporting them.

2. Newsprint is of special interest to this Department because of its political significance.

3. There is, I fear, a good deal of resentment building up in various parts of the world and this resentment is all too likely to focus on Canada as the largest exporter of newsprint in the world. We can of course try to shift the responsibility or blame to the United States; if only the United States publishers would be less greedy or if only the United States Government would check their appetite, the Canadian newsprint industry would have more supplies to meet needs elsewhere. While there is a good deal of truth in this line of argument I do not think it is a complete defence. Our Government can scarcely avoid some responsibility in the matter and, while Canadian commercial interests may lie in the direction of selling every possible ton of newsprint in the United States, Canadian political interests (and I would add Canadian defence interests) lie in ensuring reasonably adequate supplies in countries that are our friends and allies.

4. My first reaction to proposals for any sort of international intervention in the field of newsprint is to shy away from them. The Canadian newsprint industry would, I imagine, resist vigorously. The attempt of the Production and Resources Board to deal with newsprint problems during the last war was a singularly unhappy one. It is difficult to be optimistic about any arrangements in this field which might originate from the Central Group (U.S.-U.K.-France) recently established in Washington.

5. Nevertheless I believe we should think very carefully before resisting or obstructing any positive proposals that may come from the Central Group or other sources. If Canada refuses to discuss international arrangements regarding newsprint the whole weight of criticism all around the world falls on us. On the other hand, if we make it clear that we are willing to enter into discussions with the main producers and consumers (including, of course, the United States) we shift part, indeed perhaps most, of the weight where it belongs: i.e. onto the United States.

6. Judging from difficulties and recriminations that arose during the last war regarding newsprint allocations and restrictions in the United States, I believe the United States authorities will be most reluctant to introduce them again under present conditions. I do not believe they will do so until the newsprint situation around the world is pretty desperate. And at such a time, when the United States Government is willing to face up to the embattled U.S. publishers, I believe our Government could and should face up to the embattled Canadian newsprint producers. Our Government should then be willing to introduce whatever system of controls or allocations the situation may warrant.

7. I do not mean, for a moment, that we should carry on a campaign in favour of international allocations, or that the Canadian Government should, on its own initiative, cut down our exports of newsprint to the United States; either action would unnecessarily incite the United States press to attacks on Canada and the Canadian Government. The very fact that the Central Group exists, and that it has assumed responsibility for initiating whatever international action is needed in the field of raw materials, means that we are fully justified in taking no initiative. On the other hand we should, I believe, be scrupulously careful not to resist or obstruct international discussions if they are proposed by the Central Group.

8. I would much appreciate your views on the suggestions in this letter.

Yours sincerely,

A.D.P. HEENEY

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, February 24, 1951

Dear Mr. Heeney:

In reply to your letter of February 21st on the political implications of the newsprint situation, I think our stand on this matter should be one of supporting any action the Central Group takes to initiate discussions on the international allocation of newsprint.

I agree with you that we should not take any action on our own initiative to cut down on our exports to the United States or to make them feel that we are discriminating against them. At the same time, I feel that international allocations determined by the major producers and consumers, including the United States, is the only solution to this problem of supplying pulp and paper to countries other than the United States. I would certainly not be in favour of any action that would resist or obstruct any international discussions that might be proposed by the Central Group. I think a more positive approach is called for at this time and, in fact, it might be advisable to do what we can unofficially to get such discussions under way as soon as possible. On the other hand, I do not think it is necessary, at this stage, for Canada to go officially on record in support of international measures to deal with the pulp and paper situation.

I think you will find that the newsprint association is more or less in agreement with this line of action, and you might be interested in seeing a letter, dated February 9th,† which Bob Fowler sent to E.A. Holmes, deputy paper controller for the British in the last war. A copy of this letter was sent to Norman Robertson and is available in his files.

CONFIDENTIAL

Following for M.W. Mackenzie, Trade and Commerce, (Attention T.N. Beaupré) copy to A.W.F. Plumptre and J.J. Deutsch, Department of Finance, from S.V. Allen, Begins: Reference International Materials Conference. Reference circular telegram B. 18 of February 26th† from London, initial United States reaction to the United Kingdom suggestion is that the Commonwealth should not have more than three representatives on the central group. It is now fairly certain that the central group will be enlarged by additional representation of O.E.E.C. and O.A.S. as groups and as a result our attitude concerning Canadian participation in the central group needs definition. There has been no indication so far as to what direct effect, if any, the central group's activities will have on the work of the individual committees but control over the secretariat and the establishment of new commodity committees, and their membership, will be a part of its functions. Although enlargement of the central group to include O.E.E.C. representation, for example, might have the effect of relieving pressures on us from individual countries for raw materials, of which we are excess producers, it seems to me that our position in respect of items for which we are claimants might be weakened by non-participation, especially in the case of those committees where we have no direct representation, for example, wool. Early comments on this point would be appreciated.

2. We expect we shall be requested to participate actively in the central group secretariat by the assignment of a "body". Charles W. Jeffers, chief of the industry division of E.C.A., is to be the executive secretary of the secretariat, and the United Kingdom have appointed J.H. Penson, Attaché at the Embassy, as assistant executive secretary. Although the channelling of information to the various committees in the case of non-members has not been clarified, the secretariat might become the official channel, and for that reason Canadian participation would be a useful means of keeping track of the work of the committees where we are not represented. So far, committee papers are only being distributed to members.

3. Our views on the nomination and election of Canadian nationals as permanent chairmen and vice-chairmen of the Commodity Committees are still being sought. Fred Winant who is now special assistant to Gibson of DPA, raised the matter with English yesterday, when he was assured that we had no strong views on the subject, but that it would be preferable for large producing countries not to chair committees if suitably qualified individuals from other countries could be found. Winant mentioned Bateman as a possible ideal chairman for the Copper, Lead, Zinc Committee. Of the six committees now planned, this is the most likely one for which we might be asked to supply the chairman. It is impossible to estimate what time would have to be devoted to the work but some United States officials think the committees should meet for a month now, recess and convene again when desirable. The United States is anxious to avoid the prolonged operation of the committees with temporary chairmen of United States nationality but it will be necessary for such arrangements to continue for two or three weeks until members become better acquainted.

4. There has been some suggestion of a budget for the I.M.C. but no indication yet of United States thinking as to a formula or the forum for discussing it. Ends.

Following for S.V. Allen from T.N. Beaupré, Begins: We remain convinced that neither the central group's terms of reference nor membership should be enlarged upon. However, we recognize that if the membership is increased it is quite likely that the central group will take on additional powers. Under these circumstances we feel that if the central group is to be enlarged to seven we should make a strong case for Canadian representation. Furthermore, we think that any plans to further enlarge the central group to eleven should be resisted.

I believe that in our telephone conversations we have covered the other points raised in your WA-794. We are now considering possible representation on the central group and its secretariat if we are appointed to the central body. We note that, although the United States is not anxious to continue the operation of the committees with temporary chairmen, they are resigned to the necessity of carrying on such arrangements for another two or three weeks. We agree with this plan, and will be prepared to discuss the possibility of Canada's providing chairmen at the end of this period if there remains some demand for Canadian chairmen. Ends.

TELEGRAM WA-896 Washington, March 9, 1951

Reference Allen's message to Mackenzie WA-868 of March 7th.† Central Group, International Materials Conference.

1. I saw Willard Thorp, Assistant Secretary of State, this morning at his request. He said that agreement had been reached yesterday afternoon between the British, American and French representatives to support the enlargement of the Central Group to ten members to include four from the Western Hemisphere, four from Europe and two from Asia to the Far East. Speaking for the three governments he then extended an invitation to Canada to become a member of the group. He added that he was not at liberty to tell me which other countries were being invited to join; it would be embarrassing to pass this information around until their acceptance had been secured. The membership, however, would include the present three and representatives of O.E.E.C. and the Organization of American States.

2. This means that the four Western Hemisphere members would be the United States, O.A.S., Canada and one Latin American country. The four European members would be the United Kingdom, France, O.E.E.C. and one other, and the remaining two would presumably be India and Australia.

3. He asked me to let him have a reply by Monday, as it is desired to make an announcement as soon as possible and to preserve secrecy in the meantime. I told him I was sure that the Canadian Government would accept, since our view was that if the original membership of three was to be changed (which we did not wish) so that the Central Group became more fully representative of the non-Communist world, the Canadian interest as producer and consumer of raw materials made Canadian membership necessary.

4. I took the opportunity of raising some other questions about the work of the conference. About the role of the Central Group he said that its main functions were to see that commodity committees were set up as the need arose on a proper representative basis, to do the supporting work for the commodity committees, such as provision of the secretariat and other services, and, as he put it, to see that "the area was well occupied" which ought to be filled. The last he thought was the most important duty. The Conference was an experimental organization and no settled pattern of operations should be adopted as yet.

5. I asked him about pressures to establish new commodity committees. He said that he thought the pressures were currently greatest for a committee on pulp and paper; there is also some demand for a committee on hides and skins and among some of the Latin Americans for a committee on tin-plate. He thought that the newsprint issue would have to be tackled because of its pressing importance, and he readily recognized that this must involve some restriction on consumption in the United States.

6. I also asked him about a question which has arisen in some of the commodity committees — the admission of non-members as observers. He said that this was not settled and that the United States view was that it should be left for consideration by the enlarged Central Group. He agreed that once the admission of observers started it would be difficult to control.

7. Will it be possible for you to give me by Monday morning an official reply to the invitation to Canada to join the Central Group? Please pass copies immediately to Messrs. Plumptre, Deutsch and Beaupré.[15]

RE INTERNATIONAL MATERIALS CONFERENCE

Following for M.W. Mackenzie, Department of Trade and Commerce, repeat to Plumptre and Deutsch, attention Beaupré, from S.V. Allen, Begins: The initial central group members have now agreed to set up an IMC Pulp and Paper Committee and invitations are to be issued shortly after agreement on membership has been reached. No other new committees are presently under serious consideration and previous suggestions concerning groups to deal with hides and skins and fats and oils have now been shelved.

2. Understand that the Union of South Africa is making representations concerning membership on enlarged central group. As the new membership has been announced the position of new members presumably will have to be dealt with by the larger group and it would therefore be appropriate for the Embassy to be instructed on what attitude we should adopt here. Ends.

LETTER NO. E 438 Ottawa, March 21, 1951

NEWSPRINT SHORTAGE IN FRANCE

When Mr. Pleven was here Mr. Alphand raised this question with Mr. Norman Robertson and others.[16] Shortly afterwards Mr. Queuille wrote to Mr. Robertson. He had heard that there was likely to be a slight increase in newsprint production in Canada and wondered whether this increase might not be available to France. Mr. Queuille was invited to call on the Department to discuss the subject in some detail and he did so yesterday.

2. Mr. Queuille said that France was confronted by two separate problems in the field of newsprint and wood pulp. There was a long term problem arising from a shortage of pulp wood for the French mills. Supplies of pulp wood from the French Zone of Western Germany were no longer forthcoming. (I rather gathered that the French had taken a good hack at the German forests as long as the opportunity offered).

3. The more immediate problem was a shortage of newsprint in the face of the coming elections which would take place in a few months. The demand would increase and (although this was not quite clear) supplies from certain sources seemed to have been cut off recently. The French Government could of course control the situation and spread the available newsprint around thinly among the French publishers but this was an undesirable type of action particularly shortly before an election.

4. The Canadian position was explained in some detail to Mr. Queuille. He was told that Canada was facing requests for additional supplies of newsprint for a large number of countries, including India, Egypt, Yugoslavia, South American countries, and others.

5. Experiences in the last war had shown all too clearly that many United States publishers would seize any opportunity to blame the Canadian Government or the Canadian newsprint industry, or both, for any shortages of supply of newsprint from Canada under a regime of controls. If there was to be any cutting back of United States consumption it should be undertaken by the United States authorities and not by the Canadian Government or the Canadian newsprint industry.

6. The Canadian newsprint industry has been developed to serve the American market rather than the Canadian market. The Canadian mills have contracts with their American customers. These contracts have in them clauses under which the Canadian mills undertake to meet the "requirements" of their customers in the United States. Thus any increase in Canadian production is already "spoken for" at a time (like the present) when American demand for newsprint is strong. There is no surplus automatically available to be sent to other countries.

7. It may be admitted that the legal position of these "requirements contracts" might be challenged in a court of law. The hold which the American customers have over their Canadian suppliers stems not so much from the terms of the contracts as from the general power of the press in the United States. The "requirements contracts" can always be used as an argument if Canadian supplies which are wanted in the United States get diverted elsewhere.

8. It was pointed out to Mr. Queuille that under these circumstances it would be very difficult indeed for the Canadian Government (let alone the Canadian newsprint industry) to set aside even small amounts for overseas countries. The best hope of these countries, if they felt themselves short of newsprint, was to use the facilities of the International Materials Conference in Washington. It was not up to Canada, as the world's chief supplier, to press for action there; this was the responsibility of the countries feeling shortages. Nevertheless it was the intention of the Canadian authorities to facilitate international consultation in Washington and, if this proved to be necessary, international action.

9. Mr. Queuille said that he would transmit this information to the authorities in France.

INTERNATIONAL MATERIALS CONFERENCE

1. We would be grateful if you would give this matter your attention first thing Monday morning. There is a meeting of the Copper-Lead-Zinc Committee on Monday at which important precedents may be set. The matter was discussed yesterday (Friday) between Messrs. Beaupré, Harvey, Deutsch, Hewett, Monture and Plumptre. Beaupré expected that Mackenzie would raise these matters with Mr. Howe and that instructions would be telephoned to Allen.

2. The Copper-Lead-Zinc Committee is the first to get its statistics together and grapple with the problem of re-distribution of supplies. It formed a statistical subcommittee some weeks ago. The report of this committee, which is to be considered on Monday, does not merely set out the facts of the problem but suggests certain simple formulae for re-distribution of supplies of copper. Apparently the subcommittee agreed that each country ought to get its stated military requirements without question. Stockpiling would get next priority but there was some difference of view in the subcommittee about how this should be handled. The residue should be divided between the countries of the world in proportion to their use in some recent period — 1949, 1950, or both. This residue is described in the statistics as "essential civilian". Allen has taken part in the statistical subcommittee, but, like others, he was, we understand, acting as an expert and not representing his Government in this exercise. The result of the exercise suggests cutbacks of "essential civilian" use in all participating countries of not less than 15 per cent and not more than 25 per cent, depending upon how much is allowed for stockpiling.

3. Beaupré, who convened yesterday's meeting, began by pointing out that Canadian officials have recently been prone to "pass the buck" to IMC when approached by representatives of countries who wanted metals, newsprint, etc. It was important, therefore, that officials should try to ensure that the recommendations produced in IMC were reasonably acceptable to Ministers. He doubted whether the formula described above would be acceptable. Ministers might well be willing to meet real emergencies as they arose amongst our allies and for this purpose might envisage restriction of Canadian supplies, pockets of unemployment, etc., but they would not face up to such situations merely to implement a statistical formula. Hence, even though Allen, as an expert, had accepted the report of the subcommittee it seemed desirable to make different proposals when the Committee met on Monday.

4. Beaupré suggested that the Committee should set up a "Ways and Means Subcommittee" and other members of the group elaborated the suggestion. It would seem desirable, now that the basic statistics have been set up and the order of magnitude of the deficiency of copper indicated (statistically 20 per cent of supply of which about half may be "water"), that the main supplying countries should offer to try to meet the situation by a judicious re-distribution of supplies in response to established needs and emergency requirements. This "Ways and Means Subcommittee" might consist of the main suppliers — Canada, the United States, Peru, Chile, Rhodesia and Belgian Congo. The supplying countries would naturally want to satisfy themselves of the validity of the demands being made both by each other and also by other countries before accepting reductions in the supplies made available to their own people. Hence this avenue should be explored before the Committee even considered arbitrary cutbacks. A similar first approach to emergency situations is already being tried out in the field of newsprint.

5. Hewett emphasized that he imagined most countries had put in requirements which were inflated by 10 or 15 per cent. He suggested that it would not be too difficult to squeeze down Canadian usage by something like 10 per cent but beyond that there would be a real difficulty and he would certainly be going well beyond the present instructions of his Minister.

6. Plumptre emphasized that no action should be taken by Canada which would cause a breakdown of the Copper Committee. United Kingdom and European countries were getting to a most precarious position in relation to the high prices and short supplies of scarce materials. The resignation of Mr. Bevan was significant. The apparent success of MacArthur in the United States caused further disturbance to European confidence, economic and political. While Plumptre agreed with Beaupré that a new approach was desirable by the Copper Committee, the matter would have to be handled with the greatest skill and tact. All the other members of the group warmly supported these views.

7. Harvey considered that the "ways and means" approach was much more satisfactory than the crude statistical approach and that it would probably work satisfactorily in Committees where Canada was a consumer as well as those in which Canada was a main producer.

8. Deutsch in particular supported the political points that Plumptre had raised but also felt strongly that Ministers would not accept cutbacks based on arbitrary worldwide formulae.

9. It was felt that it might be necessary to obtain a postponement of the Committee discussion of the Statistical Subcommittee. General agreement, however, seemed to be reached on the following points:

(a) A simple crude formula would not work satisfactorily. If a formula approach were to be adopted at all it would have to be much more refined. In particular it would have to take account of varying degrees of civilian essentiality. (So far the Sub-Committee has shied away completely from this problem).

(b) An attempt should be made in the Copper Committee to get the "ways and means" approach at least tried out before resorting to a formula. The chief responsibility would fall on the supplying countries and within this group the leadership would obviously be taken by U.S., U.K. and Canada. It was agreed that, while this proposition could be explored behind the scenes in advance, it could not work continuously behind the scenes without becoming known and causing grave suspicion.

PRICES OF BASIC MATERIAL EXPORTS

I attach a copy of a summary of a meeting held on this subject yesterday in the Department of Defence Production. A lot of very interesting and important ground was covered, some of it rather contentious.

2. I found myself talking rather more than usual and in retrospect I am not quite sure whether you will entirely agree with what I said, particularly my suggestion that the Government should not force Canadian exporters to sell at low (North American) prices when their output is being diverted to higher priced (protected) markets abroad. I am sure that these matters will be discussed again and would appreciate your guidance.

3. I am sending copies of my memorandum to Wrong, Wilgress, and Couillard, inviting their comments and suggestions.

4. I was very glad that Max Mackenzie called this meeting together. I feel that now he is divested of his responsibilities for Trade and Commerce he is becoming much more concerned about Canada's responsibilities in the material (and price) field not merely towards the United States but also to NATO allies and other countries. This attitude will naturally spread out to others in his Department.

5. I am not sure whether you will want to show all this rather detailed material to the Minister.[17]

Notes on Meeting in Department of Defence Production

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], May 10, 1951

Max Mackenzie called this meeting together. Those present: George Bateman and Bob Fowler, as well as Ottawa officials: Towers, Beattie, Taylor, Deutsch, Beaupré, Hewett, Sharp and myself.

2. Canadian exporters of base metals, wood pulps, and newsprint, have already raised some interesting questions and have asked for guidance. Officials foresee other questions. These include:

(a) A small shipment of zinc was ordered from Japan, apparently approved by SCAP, at double the normal price. Zinc is in particularly short supply in the United Kingdom at present but the Japanese price is very tempting.

(b) A United Kingdom firm wants to order a small quantity of sulphite pulp at a price nearly double the North American but about equal to Swedish prices. Sweden is the chief source of this material for the United Kingdom. Is there any objection to the Canadian exporter accepting the order and the United Kingdom price?

(c) Canadian exports of copper to the United States are made at United States ceiling price of 24 1/2 cents. This opens an escape clause in the contracts covering Canadian sales in the United States. Should Canadian firms immediately negotiate for a 27 1/2 cent price?

[17] Note marginale :/Marginal note:
Mr. Plumptre this is very interesting — & will become more so I suspect! In general your line seems to make sense but I fancy US pressure — & others — will develop pretty rapidly when new price tags go on Perhaps a note for the Minister at a later stage A.D.P.H[eeney]. May 12

(d) The price of Canadian nickel has been relatively stable and profits moderate in the recent past. Increases in cost of production are causing problems. Is there any objection to an increase in price?

(e) What is true of nickel is also apparently true of newsprint. The pulps going into newsprint could actually be sold profitably in their existing state. Is there any objection to increased price of newsprint?

(f) If allocations of one sort or another are worked by the International Materials Conference what price should apply? For instance Canadian newsprint sells at $100.00 a ton in North America and Canadian contracts with the United Kingdom are on a basis of $112.00 to make allowances for certain extra costs connected with overseas shipments. However, if Canadian newsprint is allocated to certain sterling area destinations (India, Egypt, etc.) it will sell alongside paper from soft currency sources which is fetching $300.00 or more a ton. What price should the Canadian mills charge for the paper diverted to these markets?

3. The meeting was not, of course, considering any general attempt to control export prices of Canadian basic materials. The great bulk of the Canadian product is already contracted for in the United States, the United Kingdom, and elsewhere. There is no intention that the Canadian authorities should attempt to intervene or take control.

4. However, producers were raising particular problems and would raise more. Mackenzie said that he felt that the Government could not ignore these problems. (He himself had refused an export permit on the high priced zinc to Japan — much to Bateman's disgust). He suggested that Canada had a special responsibility not to gouge the United States by means of high prices. United States ceilings covered exports to Canada and other countries; in so far as the ceilings held we were benefiting from them. Sharp and Taylor who had recently talked with price people in Washington supported this view.

5. Towers questioned the refusal to send zinc to SCAP at high prices and raised the question whether Canadian responsibilities did not extend into the field of supply and distribution of materials rather than their prices.

6. I said that, while we might have a special relationship with the U.S., we certainly should not merely keep prices down on this continent and let the rest of the world go hang. Our NATO allies, and others in the free world, were already very suspicious that North America was looking after itself and letting the devil take the hindmost. Witness the resignation of Bevan. Hence our interest had to extend well beyond prices of sales to U.S.A. I went on to emphasize Towers' point — that we should keep our eye on the ball which was supplies. If we fulfilled our responsibilities in this regard we would ease price situations where they were most harmful; but that was incidental to relieving the shortage itself.

7. It was pointed out, from several angles, that if Canadian suppliers did not charge prevailing prices in markets abroad (e.g. zinc in Japan, pulps in U.K.) they would simply be handing a fat profit to some middleman or producer abroad.

8. Towers emphasized that, in part, the problem arose because the prices we charged the U.S.A. were often, over a long period, uneconomically low. Sometimes Canadian producers did not pass on costs of depletion (e.g. Canadian forests); U.S.

domestic producers got tariff protection, subsidies when needed, and other advantages from time to time (e.g. copper); the brunt of any decline in demand always fell on the foreigners; for these and other reasons one could justify charging higher prices to U.S. than their own producers were receiving at home. Incidentally, high prices on U.S. sales improved our dollar position. Nevertheless, there were political and other difficulties in pursuing this line.

9. Fowler said that the price of newsprint would have to rise soon, that many U.S. publishers recognized this, but that he feared objection from the U.S. authorities. (He is obviously angling for Canadian government backing on newsprint price increases. Such backing was given in the last war and led to a good deal of acrimony between government representatives.)

10. Mackenzie asked if the general level of our export prices were raised (newsprint, copper, etc) this should apply to Canadian producers? Fowler thought that Canadian mills could drag their feet before applying higher prices in Canada. Bateman thought the prices at home and in the U.S. should be the same and so did most of the meeting. It was specially difficult to sell to U.S.A. at prices above our own domestic as long as we get the protection of their ceilings on exports to Canada.

11. The position of copper was agreed to be peculiar. It seemed unfair that the U.S. should pay higher prices for Chilean copper than Canada. On the other hand it seemed undesirable for Canadians to make life difficult for the U.S. price authorities unless there was very strong justification for them doing so in terms of rising costs and shrinking profits (which would not appear to be the case). It was generally agreed that domestic producers of copper in the United States were likely to protest against the higher price being paid to Chile. It would be desirable for these producers to "make the running" on behalf of higher prices for imports from Canada.

12. In regard to the problem arising from allocations, I suggested that, if the Canadian producers were willing to charge North American prices on these "forced sales" in remote and uncertain markets, so much the better; but that I did not see why the government should force them to accept less than the "generally ruling price" in the country to which the forced sale was made. I repeated my emphasis on getting supplies to where they were needed, rather than controlling prices as such. The others present agreed that this was a good principle but a number of points emerged in the discussion:

(a) Countries with shortages would no doubt hope and expect to buy at North American prices — and would scream if they were charged more.

(b) On the other hand, additional supplies from North America would soften prices abroad.

(c) A good deal of the "steam" behind demands for allocations might disappear if North American prices did not apply.

(d) The fact that dollars, not soft currencies, were involved would further curtail requests for our supplies if prevailing prices were charged.

(e) In some cases (newsprint may be one) producers may be quite willing to accept North American prices, especially if there is any likelihood of the new

"forced" markets becoming permanent. This might be one way of getting back into some sterling markets lost during the period of acute dollar scarcity.

13. Out of all these and many more considerations it seemed possible to distil these principles to guide Ottawa officials when price problems were raised by exporters:

(a) Exporters should not be discouraged from accepting ruling prices in foreign countries merely because Canadian prices are lower. However, they should be discouraged from "upsetting apple carts" abroad — from "making the running" on price increases.

(b) In some cases, where Canadian exports dominated certain foreign markets (newsprint in U.S.A., nickel), Canadians could not help "making the running"; and in these cases price increases would have to be justified in relation to increasing costs in Canada.

(c) In general, Canada's chief responsibility to NATO partners and other free countries must be conceived in terms of supplies — meeting demonstrable and harmful shortages — rather than in terms of attempting to police price situations all around the world.

TELEGRAM WA-1963 Washington, May 10, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

Your EX-988 of May 5th re International Materials Conference.

1. It is quite apparent that the Canadian position should be urgently reconsidered, as if we further pursue the line suggested we could become the one country responsible for blocking effective action by the conference. There is no sympathy for our proposals in the light of possible acceptance by the United States of formulae which in the case of sulphur and molybdenum will cut availabilities to them for civilian production to less than 1950 consumption. Other excess producers also favour the generally-accepted method of approach, and our position is therefore untenable, unless we can consider it as a method to meet immediate hardship needs, rather than a principle which we support for application to the work of all committees for a longer period.

2. Your message was discussed early Monday by Matthews, English, Monture and Allen in relation to the copper-lead-zinc sub-committee draft report. It was agreed that postponement of discussion in the main committee would not be possible and therefore the issue would probably have to be faced at Monday's meeting. This was felt desirable because since Allen's return from Ottawa he had endeavoured without success to convince committee members in line with the suggestions made in your paragraph 9 (b) that the approach of the sub-committee in our opinion would not produce effective results in the time necessary.

3. At the Copper-Lead-Zinc Committee meeting each representative in turn was asked what views his government had concerning the draft report and the approach to allocation being studied. Allen accordingly adopted a bold but logical line in presenting our proposals on the grounds that our method would result in immediate urgent supply problems being dealt with sooner than would be the case on the basis of the formula under consideration which in the end might produce a neat and tidy table of figures but a totally unworkable method of allocation. He stressed that it would take weeks to reach agreement on the details of the allocation scheme envisaged and meanwhile urgent needs which should be met would have been given no attention. Allen's argument was strengthened by the fact that the committee had practically agreed that allocation before the end of this year would be impossible in any event. He therefore had reason to hope that our proposal would strike a responsive note in some quarters.

4. There was only a limited amount of sympathy for our thesis. France admitted that a similar and partially successful approach in OEEC had shown that temporary supply problems could be dealt with if there was a will to make the necessary adjustments. The United Kingdom favoured the adoption of our proposal if it could be considered purely a temporary measure pending a formal allocation scheme. The United States representative felt that the basic question was "whether a formal allocation system was necessary;" if so, he felt that Canadian view represented a drastic change in the method of approach from that generally accepted by members of the conference. Moreover, the Canadian proposal was merely a method for dealing with export tonnages by producers without proper consideration of their own consumption levels. Allen took the line that we accepted the findings of the sub-committee on the need for action but that we differed on the method of approach to redistribution being studied. He stressed that a more realistic attitude was not inconsistent with the general objectives of the conference. The Italian and Norwegian representatives also favoured our scheme providing it was a provisional one operative only for 1951. The Australian representative was dead set against our suggestion if it was not more than an interim scheme (in spite of the fact he privately disclosed later, that Canberra had views similar to our own but that they would subscribe to the general approach if they were given a stockpile of copper), and argued for a well documented statistical basis to which a suitable formula — modified in special cases if necessary — would be applied in order to reach allocations which would be "fair and equitable". The end result was that the committee continued discussion of the sub-committee working paper without taking our suggestions seriously.

5. The Manganese-Nickel-Cobalt Sub-Committee which is involved in the same sort of exercise which has not reached the report stage, discussed our proposal on Tuesday. They want us to table a paper for consideration along with the report to the main committee at an early date.

6. The informal Commonwealth Committee met Wednesday at the British Embassy with Lord Knollys as chairman. Allen briefly outlined the proposition which he had presented to the two committees and the reaction on the whole was even less favourable. Knollys felt that the pattern of the conference would be set by the United States in terms of the quantities of materials of which it was an excess producer which it would be prepared to share with other countries; he added that there was a fair chance of the United States accepting large cutbacks in order to make the conference a success. He felt that the problem before the conference involved three main considerations:

(a) The acceptance of a general principle that there should be formal allocation schemes,

(b) the working out of suitable formulae to make the schemes effective with special provision for departure from strict statistical bases in cases where this was necessary,

(c) some method of dealing on an interim basis with urgent problems probably along the lines of our scheme. (He asked pointedly whether this proposal was one which we favoured for the whole period of possible allocation).

7. The lack of producer-country interest is particularly noticeable. India, however, in the Manganese-Nickel-Cobalt Sub-committee is anxious to ensure adequate readjustment of any formula to take care of increased civilian needs of manganese, but no criticism of the approach to a formula based on past consumption has been lodged.

8. Following are specific comments on the work of other committees:

(a) Sulphur: because this committee's work is most advanced your attention is directed to Document 32 Sulphur Report No. 2 of May 2nd† which might well become the pattern for the final copper-lead-zinc and other committee reports. Although it is fully anticipated this report may not meet long term conditions and is subject to amendment, it is likely the United States will agree to cutting its 1951 sulphur consumption to the 93 percent of 1950 consumption recommended. United States acceptance of the principle (which they have not opposed during two months work at the sub-committee level) will establish a principle to which we would be forced to conform in its broad aspects. You will note however, that the tentative allocations of sulphur to certain countries e.g. Brazil, Sweden, Germany, New Zealand and Switzerland have been increased to take account of industrial or economic growth as reflected in the past trend of consumption.

(b) Tungsten-molybdenum — the United States were extremely anxious to have 1951 requirements used as a basis for a formula; the United Kingdom favoured 1950; the result to date has been a compromise which under the most favourable circumstances would give the United States 58 percent of 1951 molybdenum requirements for essential civilian production. In this case there is no stockpiling issue and the defence needs have been given first priority under all formulae considered. As in all other committees the idea of special priority requirements for defence supporting activities has been abandoned because of the difficulty of finding an acceptable definition. Although the subject is temporarily deadlocked at the sub-committee level the United States is faced with the prospect of receiving much less molybdenum for essential civilian use including defence supporting activities in 1951 than they used in 1950.

(c) Pulp and paper — because of special circumstances we can hardly argue that the newsprint approach is the one that can be used in other cases. It is already generally accepted that no formula of equitable distribution based on past consumption would be workable and that for the most part the committee's best field of operations will be to deal with spot problems.

9. To sum up, the United States members in all committees and at other levels consulted to date favour the adoption of an approach to allocation based on past patterns of consumption which would give priority to defence (and stockpiling needs) and distribute the balance for civilian consumption to claimant countries on an agreed formula with certain adjustments to meet special conditions. Our efforts could be best devoted to establishing a case for special treatment. Secondly, the United States representatives on committees strongly expound the theory of a formal allocation scheme which will distribute supplies as equitably as possible for an agreed period. They feel that any other approach will not satisfy most countries and that the larger producers and consumers would not be relieved of the individual pressures to which they have been subject up to now by anything less than a comprehensive scheme.

10. Monture, who attended both the Monday and Tuesday meetings will be able to report first hand on his return to Ottawa at the end of the week, on the presentation Allen made and the reaction of the committees to it. Ends.

CONFIDENTIAL Washington, May 15, 1951

Dear Mr. Bull,

RE NEWSPRINT

Your letter of May 9th† concerning newsprint for Jugoslavia and India arrived in the same mail as Department of External Affairs Circular Document No. A.35/51 of May 7th,† and to bring you up to date the following is a report on the activities of the Pulp-Paper Committee of IMC insofar as they may affect the requests being received for newsprint in Ottawa.

At the first meeting of the Committee, a special Emergency Newsprint Supply Committee was set up comprising representatives of Canada, U.S. and Sweden. I happen to be the Chairman. This Committee's first task was to consider what action should be taken to meet the needs of countries who (a) had very small requirements, (b) could not meet a portion of their own requirements from domestic production and (c) whose immediate needs from a political point of view were urgent because of their location on the periphery of the Iron Curtain or where they had a newsprint problem in meeting the needs of a free press. It was agreed that the total emergency shipments within the next two or three months should not exceed a total of seven to ten thousand tons to all the countries concerned.

After four meetings the Committee turned in a report, of which a copy is attached.† This report was the best that could done in the limited time and since the last meeting of the Pulp-Paper Committee, telegrams have been sent to the countries concerned in order to obtain data upon which to base a more accurate assessment of emergency needs. Ceylon and Pakistan have been added to the countries concerned and their emergency needs, if any, will have to be taken care of out of the total of ten thousand tons. This figure represents the maximum amount which the U.S. authorities concerned (State Department and NFA) feel that publishers in the U.S. would be willing to forego for this special purpose. Incidentally, there is, I understand, informal agreement on the part of the publishers that such an operation is desirable providing the requirements are screened and the necessary arrangements can be made for shipping, etc. We expect to have the necessary data available within three weeks at the outside when the Subcommittee will rephrase its report to the Main Pulp-Paper Committee for recommendation to the Governments on that Committee. You will note that the requirements of India and Yugoslavia have been taken into account and you could inform them that their needs are under consideration even though it would be inappropriate to refer to any tonnage figures. The report is of such a preliminary nature that we must not prejudge what the attitude of the Main Committee or of the Governments to be consulted may be.

Since the Emergency Supply Committee report on the needs of the "peripheral countries" was considered, the Main Committee has asked the Subcommittee to look into the needs of certain countries in Europe. This has now been done but you can take it for granted that the report to the Main Committee is going to be a negative one for the simple reason that U.S. publishers are not likely to forego any further newsprint from Canada in the immediate future and that a further request at this time may jeopardize the more urgent needs of the countries whose requirements will be met from the ten thousand tons. The countries to be covered by the second report will be the U.K., France, Germany and Italy, but everyone here has agreed that apart from the difficulty mentioned above, any special treatment rendered such countries at this time would result in pressures from other countries whose needs might be just as urgent, which would entail continued emergency treatment of all requests. The only possible way in which the needs of all countries can be dealt with is by a longer term operation through which complete data is made available to the Committee for proper assessment of the requirements of one country in terms of all others. This will be very disappointing to France and the U.K. especially, but there is marked resistance here on the part of the U.S. to any special treatment and with that further point we must concur.

In accordance with our usual practice of distributing documents direct from here to those in Ottawa who may be concerned, a copy of this letter is being sent to those listed below.

Yours faithfully,
S.V. ALLEN

RE PULP-PAPER COMMITTEE (IMC)

Following for Beaupré, repeat to Plumptre, from Allen, Begins: At May 18th meeting consideration was given to special emergency needs of newsprint for France, Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom in the light of emergency newsprint subcommittee's report in which no action was recommended until the statistical picture was completed in about six weeks' time and the position of all countries could be assessed in terms of supply and each others' needs.

2. The French delegate was particularly exercised by the unwillingness of the subcommittee to recommend immediate action on his case for the shipment of between 2,500 and 3,000 tons of newsprint. He pulled out all the stops in appealing to the main committee's sense of duty on political grounds and suggested abandonment of the statistical criteria used as a basis for the subcommittee's negative recommendation. The amount requested is a scaled down requirement which the French claim is needed to take care of election requirements. They intend to borrow the tonnage for immediate use and to replace it by the allocation they hope the IMC Pulp-Paper Committee will grant.

3. It is apparent the French have put considerable faith in the IMC Pulp-Paper Committee to solve this problem and that very strong instructions have been given their delegate in this matter. On a strict statistical basis their stock position may be only slightly worse than that of Germany and Italy, i.e., three or four days' consumption against a week's usage in the case of the other two countries.

4. In committee I personally expressed my sympathy for the position of France (and the other countries) but have consistently adopted the line as spokesman for the subcommittee that it is impossible for the committee to deal with emergency requests until complete statistical data for all countries are available. They may be an overriding political consideration with which, however, the IMC Pulp-Paper

Committee would find it difficult to deal. If the committee is expected to make decisions solely on political grounds unrelated to the statistical facts and practical possibilities it would have to establish priorities for political reasons and would thereby jeopardize the ultimate chance of deserving countries receiving more newsprint than they may now be getting.

5. At yesterday's meeting I stated that if the main committee did not wish to accept the subcommittee's report this was their prerogative but that I would have to vote against any proposal to give the French special consideration as it was our view that we couldn't assess the special needs of one claimant until we had more complete data; also that in the interest of all countries and especially the United States publishers who would have to sacrifice tonnage on a substantial scale, patience was required. Norwegian and Swedish delegates supported my views as did also the other claimants, Germany and Italy. I pointed out that if the main committee were to make a special recommendation covering France the concurrence of our governments would have to be sought before implementation. It was quite apparent that Italy and Germany would be reluctant to abandon their claims for special treatment. The United Kingdom representative (who is now the permanent chairman of the main committee) officially withdrew the United Kingdom request for favourable emergency treatment and urged that special consideration be given to France. Ticoulat of NPA (United States representative and vice chairman) adopted a strictly correct attitude in committee under extremely heavy pressure to see that something is done for France and is privately very sympathetic. State Department's representative on the subcommittee however, has consistently opposed a special operation of this character but I am unable to establish today if this is still the State Department's attitude. Ticoulat however feels that our fear of further pressure on the committee for emergency treatment may be exaggerated and that if our opposition were withdrawn the other dissenters would fall into line.

6. During the week I was in close touch with Fowler regarding this matter but during the meeting I telephoned him to report on the French attitude and to establish whether or not we should change our viewpoint in the main committee. Subsequent to my conversation with Fowler I learned that the French delegate had telephoned his Embassy here suggesting they contact their Embassy in Ottawa in order that the matter could be raised with External Affairs. The above report may be helpful in any discussions with the French who may tend to disregard the facts that

(a) He [Allen] was also speaking as chairman of the subcommittee,

(b) Others at the table opposed special emergency treatment.

7. A further meeting of the main pulp-paper committee has been set for the afternoon of May 22 to reach final conclusions on the French request before adjournment until July and it would therefore be useful if I had new instructions as to the attitude I should adopt. I shall report by telephone Monday morning on the State Department's current thinking.

8. Please ensure this message is relayed to Fowler. The text of the subcommittee conclusions is contained in my immediately following message.† Ends.

NEWSPRINT; EMERGENCY ALLOCATION TO FRANCE

11. The Minister of Trade and Commerce reported that the French government were pressing for a special emergency allocation of newsprint. The matter was now before the Pulp and Paper Committee of the International Materials Conference in Washington.

An emergency Newsprint Sub-committee had been established to consider various claims and had recommended that 10,000 tons of newsprint be set aside to look after the immediate requirements of eight countries bordering the Iron Curtain but not including France.

In addition to the French request, the Sub-committee had examined others from Germany, Italy and the United Kingdom which, together with France, would mean diversion of some 30,000 tons. The difficulty of assessing the various claims for newsprint on a political basis was becoming increasingly clear. Total claims might well run into several hundred thousand tons of newsprint which, if taken away from North American supply, would necessitate domestic rationing. It was believed that up to 100,000 tons could be taken away from North American supply without involving detailed rationing on this continent and the Canadian objective had been to find some solution that would avoid the political difficulties of rationing.

The issue was further confused by current wide price differentials. The prices of Scandinavian, United Kingdom and Canadian pulp delivered at London were respectively £72, £60 and £45 a ton. If Canadian production was to be allocated under I.M.C. auspices, it was thought that Canadian newsprint should be sold at the prices prevalent in the receiving country in order to prevent windfall profits by receiving governments or dealers. It was recommended that the Canadian representative be instructed to make a statement along these lines when the matter of the French request was further discussed in the Newsprint Sub-committee of the International Materials Conference.

(Department of Trade and Commerce memorandum, undated.)†

12. The Secretary of State for External Affairs felt it would be politically desirable if two or three thousand tons could be allocated to France as an emergency measure.

13. The Prime Minister was of opinion that the general policy outlined by Mr. Howe was sound and that the working out of the actual details relating to the emergency request from France might be left to his discretion.

14. The Cabinet, after discussion, approved the general policy as outlined by the Minister of Trade and Commerce with respect to the position to be taken by the Canadian representative on allocation of newsprint at the International Materials

Conference; it being understood that the working out of the details relating to France's request for an emergency allocation be left to the Minister's discretion.

PULP-PAPER COMMITTEE (IMC)

Following for Beaupré from Allen, copy to Plumptre, Begins: At yesterday's meeting of the main committee I clarified our position in regard to the emergency newsprint requirements of France and copies of my statement† are being mailed to you, Fowler and Plumptre.

2. Since Monday afternoon our greatest concern has been to ensure that the United States would not be embarrassed by our support of any favourable recommendation which the committee may make. Prior to the meeting there was not time for them to reverse the position within the State Department where they were still against the proposal to do anything more in the matter of emergency needs prior to completion of the first statistical exercise. As a result they proposed postponement of final discussion of this matter until Thursday afternoon.

3. The United States reaction to our price policy is distinctly unfavourable. They fear that in the discussions with publishers which they consider necessary in order to be able to support proposals which in the long run may mean less newsprint for the United States, the publishers will adopt the attitude that Canada should be willing to sell newsprint which they regard as a "sacrifice" at the prices which they, the publishers, would have paid if the newsprint had come to the United States. The United States feel that the publishers here would give us a lot of adverse publicity which apparently the government departments here are not prepared to counter. If, therefore, the immediate operation concerning 2500-3000 tons of newsprint can be considered as being Canadian tonnage only, i.e. no appreciable effect on United States publishers, there would be no objection to the allocation to France at Thursday's meeting. In that event, the United States would not consider it necessary to discuss the matter with the United States publishers insofar as this operation is concerned and I wonder if it would not be possible for us to "pull the newsprint out of the corners" and make it a straight question of Canadian supply of 2500 tons if the United States will supply 500 from their own mills. The committee would concur I am sure.

4. Although the Scandinavian countries are not too sympathetic I think they will play along as they are assuming that we are prepared to assist France mainly for political reasons. From their point of view of course, our pricing policy is entirely satisfactory. At the moment the United States proposes to request a secret ballot Thursday on the allocation to France (and possibly to Germany and Italy as well) which in my opinion should be avoided if at all possible. State Department are also considering requesting France to withdraw its request on the grounds (if they can be substantiated) that recent arrangements with Scandinavia for more newsprint will solve the immediate problem. NEWSPRINT FOR FRANCE

Following for Heeney from Wrong, Begins: As you requested in your telephone conversation with Matthews this morning, I have discussed the question of an emergency allocation with the State Department. I saw the Deputy Under-Secretary, Freeman Matthews; he had with him a technical officer familiar with the proceedings in the I.M.C., and Allen accompanied me.

2. Matthews agreed that it was politically important for France to receive a sufficient supply of newsprint during the election campaign. There are, however, strong objections, which I think will prove insuperable, to the United States supporting an emergency allocation if the newsprint is to be sold to France at a higher price than the contract price to the United States publishers, from whose supplies it would be mainly diverted. Matthews based his resistance to the proposal partly on the ground that the higher price would in fact be paid in part by the United States taxpayer because of the receipt by France of assistance from E.C.A., and argued that therefore it would be quite impossible to secure the concurrence of the United States publishers.

3. We explained the reasons which have led the Canadian Government to decide in general that payment for materials diverted through international allocation from normal markets should be made at the domestic price in the recipient countries and in particular that in this case French publishers should not get North American newsprint at a lower price than that paid to French mills which are their normal sources of supply. It was stated that the United States had adopted a different policy in the case of both cotton and sulphur and was charging only the normal prices when supplies are diverted to countries with a higher domestic price level.

4. The French this morning offered to withdraw their request for an emergency allocation provided that they are promised that when the Pulp and Paper Committee has completed its statistical studies they will receive an allocation of not less than 2500 tons. Apparently they can borrow newsprint from the Swiss on the basis of such an assurance. This is, however, unlikely to be acceptable and it would be a dangerous precedent for the committee to give such a promise.

5. I told Matthews that Mr. Howe would be arriving here this evening and that we would talk over the matter with him, and we had to leave it at that. The French have not been applying political pressure at senior levels in the State Department. The French Ambassador has had one telephone conversation on the subject with Thorp, but has not taken the issue up with the senior political officers. Canada seems to have been singled out for special attention. Ends.

RE NEWSPRINT FOR FRANCE

You will have seen message No. WA-2198 of May 23rd. I spoke to the Minister about it this morning and he told me that if the United States were taking the attitude described, Canada should take no further steps; if the French fail to get their newsprint it would [be] the responsibility of the United States. Mr. Pearson found the U.S. attitude on price very odd.

Subsequently I 'phoned Wrong and found that Mr. Howe in fact had already instructed Allen that as a single exception and solely because of the French political situation we should agree to sell 2,500 tons at the North American price. It was too late to have the matter reconsidered as Allen had already gone to the U.S. authorities to urge them to support an emergency allocation for France, on this basis.

IMC EXPORT ALLOCATIONS — PRICES

1. Plumptre talked to Beaupré about this yesterday and Beaupré will be talking to Allen while in Ottawa.

2. Plumptre said he believed that this Department still thought that the pricing policy earlier agreed upon (i.e. to sell export allocations at prices prevailing in recipient markets) was the most economical and sensible one. If allocated products were available cheap the demands for allocations would inevitably be inflated and the strains on the IMC machinery greatly increased. However, this Department certainly could not "make the running" in Ottawa in favour of charging high prices on allocations to foreign countries. Further, and more serious, it looked as if, once again, Canada would be in a position of isolation vis-à-vis all other members of IMC; if the weight of the United States were thrown in favour of the recipient countries it is doubtful if any others would follow our lead.

3. Beaupré said he thought that, having once supplied a country like France with newsprint at North American prices, our battle was really lost at any rate in the field of newsprint. He pointed out that if India and poorer countries were the recipients of the next allocations it would be very difficult to explain why we should be charging such countries as India more than France. There was some possibility of applying our principle in other fields where considerations were different. Plumptre said it was a pity that the matter could not be brought to a head in regard to some of those other commodities. The attitude of the United States publishers, in insisting that newsprint diverted from them should not be sold at higher prices, was entirely unreasonable and the United States officials were, as usual, weak-kneed vis-à-vis their own publishers. There was more substance, however, to the point that U.S. supplies to overseas countries in many cases would be financed by ECA and therefore should be disposed of at North American prices. Incidentally, if our allocations of newsprint have to be bought by the Government and re-sold to other countries (as seems likely), there might well be difficulties here in charging high prices to those countries.

NEWSPRINT; REQUEST FOR INCREASE IN PRICE

3. The Minister of Defence Production reported that the Abitibi Power and Paper Company Limited, one of the larger newsprint producers, had recently indicated that it wished to raise the price of newsprint by $10 a ton. When newsprint was declared an essential material under the Defence Production Act the industry was told that no increases in prices should be made until the matter had been discussed with his department. Furthermore, by an informal agreement with the United States, information about pending price increases of newsprint should be communicated to the Director of the Office of Price Stabilization.

It was noted that the demand for newsprint was now far in excess of supply, both in North America and throughout the world. Furthermore, the pulp content of a ton of newsprint could be sold in the United States for more than the newsprint itself, without taking into account finishing and packaging costs. The present price of newsprint was insufficient to attract capital into the industry. This was clearly demonstrated by the fact that of the ten new pulp and paper mills constructed or rebuilt in Canada since the last war none produced newsprint. Furthermore, because of the anomalous price situation in respect of pulp and newsprint, there was a possibility that more pulp might be diverted from newsprint production into more profitable channels.

This problem had been referred to the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy for consideration, and the Committee had recommended that the government should not at this stage exercise its power to interfere with the proposed increase in Canadian pulp prices.

(Minutes of Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy meeting, May 23, 1951.)†

4. The Minister of Finance said that, last month, Canada had had a $93 million deficit on its merchandise account with the United States. In view of this very unfavourable trade balance, it would seem inadvisable to prevent, by governmental action, any reasonable increase in the price of pulp, which was one of Canada's biggest producers of U.S. dollars.

5. The Secretary of State for External Affairs thought that the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act might be applicable in the event all Canadian producers increased their newsprint prices by the same amount and at the same time.

6. The Minister of Justice pointed out that, under the terms of the Combines Investigation Act, it had to be established that prior agreement as to price fixing had been reached by the various manufacturers concerned before any prosecution could be instituted. In the present instance, in order to avoid any suspicion that there was infringement of the combines legislation, it was suggested that it might be preferable for the government, under its emergency powers, to approve directly of a general increase in newsprint prices.

7. The Prime Minister suggested that it might be possible to issue an order to the effect that pulp, normally destined to the newsprint industry, should not be diverted to other channels, and, in order that the pulp and newsprint industries be not unduly penalized, that the government would have no objection to a reasonable adjustment in the price of newsprint.

An alternative method might be to indicate that newsprint had been declared an essential commodity under the Defence Production Act in order that, if necessary, production could be allocated under an international allocation system and not for any internal purpose such as price control and that, in the circumstances, the government could only take note of the proposed price increase without either approving or disapproving it. If this latter course of action were followed, and in order to avoid any suspicion that the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act were being violated, it was further suggested that the Abitibi Power and Paper Company alone be notified of the government's decision not to interfere and that simultaneously the Director of the Washington Office of the Department of Defence Production leave with the U.S. Office of Price Stabilization an aide-mémoire setting out the Canadian position in the matter.

A draft aide-mémoire† respecting Canadian newsprint prices was submitted and read.

8. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, agreed that:

(a) the Abitibi Power and Paper Company Limited be informed that its notification respecting a proposed increase in the price of newsprint had been received and that the Department of Defence Production did not propose to interfere in any way in the matter; and,

(b) simultaneously, an aide-mémoire respecting the proposed increase, as revised during the discussion, be given the U.S. Price Stabilization Office by the Director of the Washington Office of the Department of Defence Production.

PROJECTED NEWSPRINT PRICE INCREASE

Following for M.W. Mackenzie from S.D. Pierce, Begins: George Browne and I called on office of price stabilization this morning and told Zimmerman Director in temporary out-of-town absence of Disalle and Phelps, that Abitibi proposed to increase prices. Also present were Walter Damtoft, Assistant Director, Forest Products Division, and Rufus Worrell, Chief of Divisions Pulp Paper and Paperboard Branch.

2. We made the department's position clear and left Zimmerman the aide-mémoire, text as furnished in your EX-1173. We made it clear that the Canadian Government had gone this far and no further. When Zimmerman asked us what was the basis of the proposed increase we said we could give him only industry's views, as industry's views, on the general cost and price position. We followed the line that Fowler did in his letter,† and referred Zimmerman to details of industry's side of the case given in "newsprint data — 1950", Fowler's pamphlet, copies of which were given to OPS last November and which has been distributed to newsprint users here.

3. Zimmerman said he didn't know much about the problem since he only took over last week. He could say that the increase would be very troublesome for OPS since newsprint was a crisis commodity for OPS. It had the most explosive political implications involving press support for Disalle and his office.

4. Zimmerman did ask what would happen if OPS imposed a ceiling price on newsprint imports. We didn't know what to say to this one, but the division representatives relieved the situation by saying that the flow of newsprint between Canada and the United States meant too much to both countries and could not be impeded.

5. We gathered the impression they feel some price increase cannot be avoided. They told us they felt they would have to increase the prices they are allowing domestic producers under the provisions in ceiling price regulation 22. They didn't think they would have to allow domestic producers as much as $10.00, but they don't yet know how much because no domestic manufacturer has yet filed his appeal for price relief, complete with the complicated calculations required for claims of cost increase. Zimmerman and Damtoft wondered whether American mills were not a little fearful that grounds for rollbacks might be uncovered. I don't think this is a serious point as it is inconsistent with their statement that they expected to have to increase domestic prices.

6. My impression is that their real concern is that the Canadian price increase will be greater than the price increase they can justify for domestic producers. Here Worrell asked whether since Abitibi were going to ask for $10.00 more would they be satisfied with $5.00. Countered with the suggestion that some mills might feel they have a case to make for $15.00, Worrell came up with probably the significant suggestion of the interview. Assuming it were possible to allow an increase to domestic producers, he asked would it be possible to persuade Canadian industry to hold its general price increase to the same figure. He mentioned, perhaps only for the sake of example, the figure of seven-fifty ($7.50) pointing out difficult position for both OPS and Canadian mills if American mills generally agreed to such a figure and Canadian mills could not meet it, subject to appropriate adjustment. We replied that what price Canadian industry accepted in this transaction was in industry's hands since the Canadian Government had decided not to invoke its emergency powers in this commercial decision. It is our guess that OPS will explore this line.

7. They appreciated our giving them notice as agreed, but they were somewhat wary over the shortness of notice. We told them that Abitibi could probably not wait beyond Friday, but I know it would sit better if Abitibi could hold out a few days longer.

8. Although it made our task easier, I was disappointed that we could not see Disalle. I am sure we would have had a far different reaction from him since he was so recently quoted in the press as dismissing as an unfounded rumour the possibility of a $9.00 increase.

9. I am afraid the best we can say about the meeting is that we discharged our obligation to advise them when we heard of any coming price increase. Ends.

other countries under IMC recommendations. A total tonnage figure of 120,000 may have been mentioned.

2. It is obvious that the State Department views as conveyed in the Ambassador's telegram WA-2198 of May 23rd are unchanged and that they would welcome early assurance that the policy to be followed in the case of France would also govern newsprint prices for shipments to other countries. Specifically a sub-committee meeting is scheduled for June 4th to consider the division of 10,000 tons for the periphery countries and the United States is anxious to have this point clarified in advance of the meeting to ensure that the question of price does not need discussion by the sub or main committee.

3. As we would greatly appreciate knowing what information has been or is being given to the United States Embassy in Ottawa, your early comments would be appreciated.

1. Since despatch of our teletype EX-988 of May 5th and receipt of your WA-1963 of May 10th, further interdepartmental consideration has been given to the questions raised by the Copper, Lead, Zinc Committee of the IMC concerning copper and zinc. We have also had discussions with Allen and Carson. The following is our appraisal of the situation.

2. We now understand from Allen that it was not the Committee's intention to recommend to governments the results of the initial application of the simple formula calling for the priority allocation of direct defence requirements with the remainder being "equitably" distributed in accordance with "apparent" past consumption figures; but that these figures were merely to be the starting point from which a number of refinements could be developed.

3. We were glad to get this information because officials here believe there is very little likelihood that the Canadian Government, (or probably any other net exporting government), would look favourably upon the crude application of any simple formula designed to effect equitable international distribution of a commodity of which it is a net exporter, if it meant further restriction of its domestic consumption of that commodity, unless there was a satisfactory definition of the term "equitable" accompanied by an assurance that conservation and restriction measures were being rigorously carried out by the claimant countries, to ensure that strategic materials are used essentially for defence and defence supporting projects.

4. It is our belief that the committee should, first, scrutinize critically the statistical data submitted by each country; secondly, develop and define the various factors involved in the formula e.g., defence requirements, consumption, etc.; thirdly, seek out some way of establishing priorities for defence supporting industries including increased production of essential materials before residual allocations for civilian use are computed. We are now preparing a paper which will indicate our "defence-supporting" position.

5. We believe that the Committee must give full consideration to movement of semi-fabs, and cannot isolate international trade in virgin metals.

6. If all these factors are properly considered, (and we believe that they must be), we realize that the development of an acceptable formula will be a time consuming exercise and even in the end such a formula could only serve as an internationally acceptable point of reference from which a number of countries will inevitably seek adjustments in order to satisfy "special considerations".

7. Our ad hoc approach aimed at giving relatively early short-term assistance to particularly critical needs. In making this suggestion we did not wish to imply that we would not continue to co-operate in a search for a more formalized approach to effective distribution and, as we have emphasized, we do not want to appear obstructive. On the other hand, if increased production, conservation, more effective utilization, ad hoc adjustments and changing world conditions resulted in a situation in which an urgent need for international allocations could no longer be demonstrated, we would naturally want to avoid them.

INCREASE IN PRICE OF CANADIAN NEWSPRINT

Following for M.W. Mackenzie, copies to W.F. Bull, Trade and Commerce, A.F.W. Plumptre, External Affairs, from J.H. English, Begins: Although it was probably carried in the Canadian press, it seems desirable to draw to your attention a United Press despatch which appeared on page 51 of today's New York Times. This quotes DiSalle, Director of the Office of Price Stabilization, as saying that he intends to write a personal letter to Fowler requesting Canada to cancel the announced increase of $10 in Canadian newsprint.

Today Zimmerman of DiSalle's office has confirmed that DiSalle has already written Fowler pointing out that he does not consider that Canada exactly played cricket in this particular instance, especially from the time point of view. He referred to the understanding between DiSalle and Fowler regarding price increases and rollbacks and to the agreement that due notice of any change would be given on either side. He was therefore more than surprised at the extremely short notice which was given, commenting that he was informed by us about noon one day and read in the papers the next morning the announcement of the price increase. He thought that this aspect of the whole problem was far more important than the actual increase itself. Ends.

Le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au sous-ministre de production pour la Défense

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to Deputy Minister of Defence Production

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 9, 1951

Dear Max [Mackenzie]:

SCARCE MATERIALS — POLITICAL CONSIDERATIONS IN THE DIVERSION OF CANADIAN SUPPLIES

An incident arose in the trade talks with the French Delegation last week which has some general implications.[18] One of your men was present at the meeting with the French on Wednesday afternoon when scarce materials were under consideration and, as a result of his suggestion, one or two of their officials visited your Metals Control the next morning. The following afternoon they came back to the general meeting and reported no progress whatever: no zinc, no cadmium, no selenium and, worst of all, no increased supply of copper despite the fact that France has in the past bought substantial quantities of copper from Canada and current supplies are much reduced.

2. Our metals people had explained that our controls were in a very embryonic state, their present purpose was simply to ensure that the Canadian defence production programme got its minimum essential supplies, and that the French officials should be appealing, not to Canadian Government officials, but to the private producers of these scarce metals. The French officials understood the situation but naturally they were not greatly cheered, particularly because the French interests concerned had already been trying hard to get more Canadian copper. Later in the meetings, when the Canadian side went on to discuss the possibilities of getting additional supplies of steel from France, the French officials explained that they were quite willing to grant the necessary export permits, but that our difficulties in obtaining French steel arose from the tight situation in which French producers found themselves and that, as government officials, they could scarcely exercise much pressure on the French steel interests unless they felt that the Canadian authorities were taking a similarly solicitous attitude regarding French requests for copper and other scarce metals from Canada. The tone of the meeting was, I understand, perfectly sweet and reasonable but there is no doubt that the French felt a bit disappointed in the reception they have received on this particular point. I believe that Mr. Bull intends to explore the matter further with your Department.

3. It is not my business, nor the business of this Department, to worry over whether it is worthwhile to give the French a bit of extra help in the field of base metals in the hope of getting a bit of extra help from the French authorities in the field of steel. However, I did feel after the meeting that we in this Department may have been a bit at fault in not giving you a bit more guidance than we have in the past in relation to international political factors which may from time to time arise in connection with the diversion of Canada's exports of scarce materials, whether those diversions take the form of formal allocations or informal assistance.

4. The general pattern of Canada's exports is well established. Fortunately commercial, political, and military considerations usually all point in the same direction. This means, broadly speaking, that the United States and the United Kingdom have first call on Canadian supplies and other traditional markets have the second call. It is only the rather marginal cases, and rather occasional cases, that political interests become important. The recent instance of a tiny allocation of newsprint to France was a perfect example.

5. Naturally, since there are few occasions in which political considerations conflict with the other normal criteria, it is difficult to lay down any universal rules regarding them. Particular political interests will emerge from time to time in relation to particular countries and particular Canadian products. However, I have been wondering whether we cannot at this stage give you some general ideas for the preliminary guidance of yourself and other officials in this field.

6. Setting aside the specially preferred position of the United States and the United Kingdom, I think that the next preference goes to those NATO allies which are themselves doing, or preparing to do, a really serious job of increased defence production. We cannot lump all NATO countries together. Iceland, for example, has no military forces and no defence production. Nevertheless membership in and support of NATO is a cardinal element in Canadian foreign policy and it is particularly important, I think, that the governments and officials of NATO countries should always have the feeling that Canada is their partner and is sincerely trying to help them wherever we can.

7. Amongst the Continental NATO countries France has a special place. This is so for several reasons. First, there are the historic connections between our two countries — connections of language and race. Second, we sympathize with and support the efforts of France to assume leadership in Continental Europe and to consolidate Europe, including Western Germany, against the menace from the East. Third, there is a greater threat of Communism inside France and Italy than in any other European country outside the Iron Curtain. Fourth, and of special interest at this time, there are many straws in the wind suggesting that France is taking a special interest in Canada and we are most anxious to reciprocate this interest; it is, we believe, reflected in recent appointments to the French mission in Ottawa, in the recent visits of the French President and Prime Minister, and, at a quite different level, in the strength of the team which the French sent to last week's trade talks — a strength which is certainly not justified merely by the volume of trade between the two countries.

8. At the present time, when the supply situation all over the world is dominated by defence considerations, we must naturally give first preference to our allies, particularly those which are actively rearming. Nevertheless we cannot neglect our broader political interests, and particularly our interests in maintaining the strength of Commonwealth countries. In this sphere the most important new development bearing on scarce supplies is the Colombo Plan. This Plan implies for Canada the maintenance of close and sympathetic relations with India and Pakistan. It is through these relationships that Canada can play its most important part in holding the Eastern and Western halves of the free world together. Here again it is of great importance that the governments and officials of India and Pakistan should get the feeling that we Canadians are doing our best to help them. This feeling is perhaps even more important than the amount of scarce materials we may be able to send them; however, we cannot expect to maintain the feeling if we do not send any materials! And I know that we are going to run into difficulties in this field. Through discussions relating to the Colombo Plan I am already beginning to learn how touchy and difficult (to our way of thinking) these people are. It is clear that we are all going to have to exercise a great deal of restraint and patience. Nevertheless the political objectives are most important for us.

9. I am sending you this letter in the hope that it may be useful to you. I am also sending a copy to Mr. Bull, who may also be interested. I would greatly appreciate any comments you would like to make.

Yours sincerely,
A.D.P. HEENEY

L'adjoint spécial du sous-ministre de production pour la Défense au secrétaire commercial à l'ambassade aux États-Unis

Special Assistant to Deputy Minister of Defence Production to Commercial Secretary, Embassy in United States

[Ottawa], June 11, 1951

Dear Stan [Allen]:

This is to confirm and possibly enlarge upon our telephone conversation of June 2nd, arising from your W.A. 2339 of June 1st on the Pulp and Paper Committee of I.M.C.

When Webb, of the State Department, was in Ottawa last week the U.S. Ambassador and Bliss, their Minister of Embassy, had a dinner party for him and among the guests were the Deputy Minister, Mr. Heeney and Mr. Abbott. Mr. Mackenzie took this opportunity to start a discussion on the Canadian ideas of pricing policies.

Mr. Mackenzie went over all of the stock Canadian arguments and was ably supported by Mr. Abbott and Mr. Heeney, however, I do not know how many converts, if any, were made.

The following morning however, Willoughby who is, as you know, the Counsellor at U.S. Embassy, came under instruction to see Mr. Howe and to state that it was United States Government's hope that we would be able to agree with them on a pricing policy which, of course, means that they would wish us to make our commodities available to other markets at the same approximate price as we are selling them in the United States. I understand that the main comment that he got from Mr. Howe was a statement that it would go a long way to ease the position if there could be some assurance that our selling commodities in various markets at a price well below the prevailing price would not result in windfall profits for middlemen or others.

Following his meeting with the Minister, Willoughby had a long discussion with me and I did no more than review the various aspects of the argument. However, one thing was apparent to me in my discussion with Willoughby and that was his apparent confusion regarding his major argument. At one stage he seemed to claim that the U.S. position was based particularly on the fact that U.S. publishers would be horrified at the thought of Canadian producers holding back newsprint supplies and selling them at a higher price, however, as soon as I began to pursue this line of argument he immediately switched to his other argument which was, that the United States Congress would object to seeing their Foreign Aid Funds used for the purchase of these high-priced commodities. We then got in to a discussion of the psychological effects of the different pricing policies and Willoughby developed the very logical argument that if we were to sell this newsprint in Europe or Asia for approximately $300 a ton the various countries so effected would probably say that the rich North Americans were taking advantage of countries who are down and out and appealing for assistance. I am sure that if we did sell newsprint at higher prices, this argument would be used against us but I am equally certain that in the absence of any other criteria, if we do not have at least the sanction of prices, it is going to be most difficult to resist heavy demands for newsprint when your I.M.C. Committee settles down to do the broader allocation job.

I would suspect that when we add up all the requests that will be made upon the I.M.C. Committee, they will total something like three hundred or four hundred thousand tons. On the other hand, our American friends have indicated to us that they would not be prepared to go after their publishers for more than something in the neighborhood of one hundred and twenty-five thousand tons. Indeed, we ourselves are anxious to keep the demand on North American supplies to the minimum. It is, as you know, our thinking that we could cut back approximately two per cent without getting into any major difficulty in this country but a reduction of more than this amount might well necessitate domestic rationing of newsprint and that is a headache which obviously none of us wish to have. I would think, therefore, that it is extremely important that we do everything possible to limit the demands which will be made on North American supplies and quite honestly, I can think of no other sanction than that of price.

Willoughby was anxious to know what our continuing attitude would be on this pricing question in the I.M.C. Pulp and Paper Committee. I told him that we were anxious to continue to explore this question with the American Authorities but that because of the precedent established for the emergency allocation to France we would not raise the price issue for the other emergency allocations i.e., the ten thousand tons to the eight periphery countries. I did say, however, that we would hope that before the overall allocations were discussed in Committee that we could come to some sort of agreement with the Americans but, that if we did not, we would of course, not use this issue to upset the whole I.M.C. As you know, Bob Fowler was exploring this situation with some of his opposite numbers in the United States, and I think that the best you can do is to continue your examination of the problem in Washington and be guided accordingly.

I might mention that Willoughby told me that he would report the gist of his conversations with the Minister and with myself to Washington and suggest to them that the proper channels for continuing this discussion would be through the I.M.C. Representatives in Washington. Consequently you may expect to hear from Ticolat on this subject. I will, of course, keep you informed of any new developments here and I presume you will keep in touch with Bob Fowler.

Yours sincerely,
T.N. BEAUPRÉ

Le ministre du Commerce
au directeur de mobilisation économique des États-Unis

Minister of Trade and Commerce to Director of Economic Mobilization of United States

[Ottawa], June 12, 1951

Dear Mr. [C.E.] Wilson:

I appreciate your telephone call of this morning, and as I promised, I am enclosing a copy of a letter which has been sent to Mr. DiSalle in reply to his letter to Mr. Fowler of June 4th.†

This letter does not deal with the matter of cost increases to the newsprint mills, because, as we are not operating in Canada any overall system of price control, I do not want to convey the impression that we have given specific approval to the exact amount of the price increase. I can tell you, however, that from my own study of the situation I am satisfied that the mills have been exposed to very definite cost increases which have occurred since December of last year. The last price advance was made in November 1950, and came after 2 1/4 years without any change in the newsprint price. It was an increase of $6.00, and I do not believe that it did more than cover the actual cost increases up to that time.

Apart from actual increases which the mills have experienced in the last five or six months in the materials they have to buy, their costs are very largely affected by the progressive reduction in the length of the work week from the prevailing 48-hour week in Canada to the 40-hour week which have been in force for many years in pulp and paper mills in the United States, where the same international labour unions operate.

I have been particularly impressed with the importance of maintaining and increasing production, and it seems to me that with the present prices established under your ceilings for pulps there would, in the absence of a price increase in newsprint, be a distinct possibility of a reduction, and certainly little possibility of any increase in production.

While the Canadian government did not base its decision on the precise calculation of increased costs, I am satisfied that it was a wise decision for us not to use our emergency powers to interfere with this commercial decision. I hope that our course of action in this matter will commend itself to you.

Yours sincerely,
C.D. HOWE

Le directeur de la Direction des pâtes et papier du ministère de production pour la Défense au directeur de l'Office de la stabilisation des prix des États-Unis

Director, Pulp and Paper Division, Department of Defence Production, to Director, Office of Price Stabilization of United States

Montreal, June 12, 1951

Dear Mr. DiSalle:

Your letter of June 4th was delayed somewhat in reaching me as it was not received in Ottawa until June 8th and had to be forwarded to me here. I sent you a telegram on Friday last to tell you of this delay and promised to send an early reply to your letter.

I regret if there has been any misunderstanding between your office and this Department, and regret even more that you seem to feel that we did not fully comply with the arrangements we had made for advising you of developments in the newsprint price situation. When matters came to a head in the closing days of May, I had before me a newspaper report of your letter to Senator Johnson of Colorado which set forth your understanding of the arrangement between us. This statement used practically the same words as appear in the second paragraph of your letter of June 4th. This paragraph contains an accurate report of my telephone conversation early in May with Mr. Diskin of your office and reads in part as follows:

"You further stated that when and if you should receive such notification (of an individual Canadian mill's desire and intention to increase its newsprint price) you would examine the situation to determine whether it was an individual case or an industry problem, that if the proposed increase seemed justified the matter would be taken up with the Canadian government and that we would be advised before any increases were put into effect."

The present newsprint price increase announced by Abitibi goes into effect on July 1st, 1951. The notice to your office was given by the Department's representative in Washington on May 31st, and thus you had, not twenty-four hours' notice, but a full month's notice for study of the situation "before any increases were put into effect".

I hope you will believe me when I say that this is not a technical play with words. We felt here that you would want to know, as early as possible, what was in the wind and what the Canadian government's decision was on this question. I have been repeatedly told by U.S. publishers that in the case of past price advances they objected particularly to the shortness of time between the date of the announcement and the effective date of the price increase, which gave them no opportunity to adjust their economies to the price change. This time greater advance notice of the price rise was given, and I felt that the essential step was to have the situation clear and publicly known as soon as possible after your office had been notified, rather than to have a protracted period of speculation and rumour.

The steps outlined in the sentence from your letter, quoted above, were taken exactly as I told Mr. Diskin they would be taken. I had asked in April each Canadian newsprint manufacturer not to change his prices without first discussing the proposed change and the reasons therefor with the Department. At the time of our conversation I knew that there had been recent substantial increases in manufacturing costs and I told your office there was considerable grumbling about present prices. Shortly afterwards I received from the Abitibi Power & Paper Co. Ltd., which is one of the larger Canadian manufacturers, a request for discussion of a price increase which seemed to that company to be necessary. We met and I was given information as to the factors affecting the maintenance and expansion of newsprint production. Then to see if the problem was peculiar to the applicant or general throughout the industry, I inquired from a number of other manufacturers asking for their individual views and intentions. These companies produce over 50 percent of the newsprint made in Canada and are representative of the whole industry. It was quite clear that the problem was not peculiar to the applicant company but was a general problem affecting the whole Canadian industry.

The information thus obtained was submitted to the Minister of Defence Production. It was studied by his advisers and their recommendation was placed before the Canadian Cabinet. The Canadian government, which it should be pointed out is not operating any overall system of price controls, decided that it would not use its emergency powers to interfere with the commercial decision being taken by the Abitibi Power & Paper Co. Ltd. This decision was taken on Wednesday, the 30th of May, and was immediately transmitted to your office by this Department's representative in Washington during the morning of May 31st. I was authorized to communicate this decision to the Abitibi Company and to give similar advice to any other newsprint manufacturer who proposes an increase in the price of newsprint not out of line with the amount of the increase proposed by Abitibi; and I have done so.

Perhaps it may assist you and the members of your various committees if I list some of the facts that I reported to the Canadian government before it reached its decision.

(1) The pulp content of a ton of newsprint could be sold in the U.S. for more than the newsprint itself, without any provision for finishing or packaging costs.

(2) Newsprint depends on the same raw material — pulpwood — as other pulp and paper products. Since the termination of World War II price controls, newsprint prices in the U.S. had advanced 26.2%. By comparison, since the end of controls in the U.S. book paper prices have advanced 54.3%; kraft wrapping papers 63.1%; paperboard 91.2% and tissue papers 93.4%. If the price of newsprint had risen since decontrol as much as the U.S. government pulp and paper index, the newsprint price would now be $143 per ton. If it had risen as much as the weighted average increase shown by the four named major grades the price would now be $145 per ton.

(3) Newsprint has not apparently been attractive to new risk capital. Since the last war there have been ten pulp and paper mills constructed or rebuilt in Canada and not one of them is producing newsprint. Together these mills consume annually about 1,250,000 cords of pulpwood, which would be sufficient to produce over a million tons of newsprint. Had even a third of this new capacity gone into newsprint, it would have been sufficient to have met all apparent shortages in North America and to have relieved most of the serious situations of newsprint shortage throughout the world.

(4) Despite the fact that newsprint supply for the U.S. in 1951 will reach a new record of nearly six million tons, there is still demand in excess of supply. This 1951 total compares with 3,480,000 tons in 1945 which was the last full year of government rationing. This is an increase in supply of over 2 1/2 million tons or 72% in a period of six years. Most of this increase came from Canada, whose exports to the U.S. rose from 2,666,000 in 1945 to an estimated 4,775,000 tons in 1951 — an increase of over 79%.

(5) I expressed my own view in my report to the Minister of Defence Production in these words: "The most serious problem in newsprint today is production — maintenance of present levels and increased production wherever possible."

I have written at some length because I am anxious that you should know the facts in this case as placed before the Canadian government, when it made its decision not to initiate positive price control action under its stand-by emergency legislation, by interfacing with the commercial decision made by the Abitibi Company. I agree completely with you as to the importance of the trade in newsprint to both countries; you need our newsprint and Canada needs and wants your market.

I hope that, after study and reflection, you will agree that the Canadian government's decision was a wise one.

Yours sincerely,

R.M. FOWLER

Dear [T.N.] Beaup[ré],

RE NEWSPRINT

Thank you for your very complete letter of June 11th concerning the newsprint pricing problem in the IMC context.

I note that you feel that the proper channel for continuing this discussion is through the IMC representatives here and I will do what I can to assist in furthering our aims. I might mention, however, that as a result of conversations I have had with advisers to Mr. Ticoulat, I find that there is a distinct feeling in the State Department that the pricing policy concerns a much wider field than newsprint, consequently there may be new pressures for us to get together with them on the whole question of the pricing policy to govern third country transactions. I have carefully avoided assuming the whole burden of such a problem and in fact have endeavoured up to now to confine the matter entirely to newsprint.

Although you have covered most of the U.S. arguments rather fully, I have summarized them along with a number of additional points which have occurred to the U.S. in the past week or ten days. The complete argument now seems to be along the following lines:

1. The success of the IMC Pulp-Paper Committee's operation would be endangered if Canada insists on charging world market prices for newsprint supplied from the 120,000 tons relinquished by U.S. and Canadian publishers who have contracted for the newsprint at North American prices.

2. U.S. publishers have agreed to cooperate without thought of profit and acceptance of the loss of revenue which relinquishment of the newsprint entailed. It would be impossible for the U.S. Government to justify that Canadian producers should make a large additional profit on this operation to assist the free press in friendly countries of the world.

3. Since the United States is assisting financially many countries of the world which are in the most critical situation vis-à-vis newsprint, Canadian sales of newsprint relinquished by American publishers at world prices would mean that the U.S. taxpayer would be paying world market prices for newsprint which had been relinquished at the North American price. This would be impossible to explain to Congress or the U.S. public and might result in unfavorable publicity which both Governments would be anxious to avoid.

4. Since the Canadian Government has agreed to make available newsprint to France and the countries on the periphery of the Soviet Bloc at the North American price under the IMC allocation, it would be very difficult to justify a different treatment to others receiving part of the tonnage relinquished by U.S. publishers at a higher price.

5. The Soviet Union has supplied newsprint to Syria, Egypt and India at prices considerably lower than the Scandinavian price, thus obtaining a measure of goodwill from the press of those countries.

6. Canadian insistence on a higher price to the press of overseas countries would lessen the psychological value which would result if the newsprint relinquished by the U.S. publishers were sold to the press of the free world at the same price for which U.S. and Canadian domestic publishers obtain it.

7. The U.S. Government is allocating certain scarce domestic materials such as sulphur and cotton to foreign purchasers at the U.S. domestic price. Any newsprint which would be made available from U.S. producers in implementing the Pulp and Paper Committee's recommendations would also be made available at domestic prices. Since inflation is one of the greatest dangers for the free world, the U.S. believes that this policy is an important contribution for the defense of the free world.

Our two arguments seem to fall under two headings:

(a) Fear of black market operations

(b) Fear that the lower price will generate a flood of requests for emergency assistance.

The U.S. counter argument with regard to (a) is as follows:

The Pulp-Paper Committee has already adopted as policy a request that recipients give assurance that none of the newsprint supplied through the Committee's recommendation would leave the importing country. In addition, Canada and the United States, in implementing the recommendations of the Pulp-Paper Committee, could insist on an additional guarantee and could also insist that the recipient country take measures to see that the newsprint supplied is sold to newspapers at the price at which it is furnished in order to avoid any windfall profits to middlemen. Also, the U.S. and Canada can urge that the newspaper publishers in recipient countries establish a joint organization to police the operation in order to see that the distribution is made equitably.

With regard to the pricing problem, the argument would be roughly as follows:

The United States has been allocating certain scarce materials to various free countries of the world at prices considerably below the world market price. This operation has at times resulted in artificially high requests, but as long as the allocations are made on an equitable basis the United States foresees no difficulties in administering the program. Furthermore, most publishers abroad are aware that the operation of the Pulp-Paper Committee is made possible through relinquishment of supplies by U.S. and Canadian publishers and that the supply is limited. As long as the Pulp-Paper Committee makes its recommended allocations in an equitable manner, the U.S. does not believe that sales of the newsprint relinquished by North American publishers at the North American market price will engender ill-will. As you know, the Committee is screening requests for newsprint supply assistance to meet bonafide emergency situations and is not making allocations on the basis of supplying newsprint at lower prices when a supply is available from an applicant country's normal source of supply. It is assumed that should supplies increase to the point where the demand can be taken care of, no further operations will be undertaken.

We have endeavoured to deal with the possibility of middlemen making undue profits out of newsprint allocation in the third Subcommittee report which I hope to send you by the same mail. In my teletype† on the same subject today I suggested that we might point out to the Indian Government that some form of satisfactory distribution arrangements should be made as any windfall profits to middlemen would endanger their future possibilities of getting newsprint from North America. Another method, of course, is to give as wide publicity as possible to the operation including mention of the price. I realize that there is a possibility that we would not like to take such a line with the Indian Government by ourselves, but I am quite certain the U.S. will do so in the case of the Philippines, for example. In any event, such action would be supplementary to what the IMC might do.

As to the second argument, I think this has a great deal of merit. The difference, of course, is that the U.S. has a system of price control and Canada has not, especially with regard to commodities exported.

Although I doubt if this letter contains much that is new, it may be a useful summary of the arguments, pro and con. My own feeling is that we are going to have great difficulty in maintaining a position on the price for the large newsprint operation, as the U.S. strongly feel that without agreement that the North American price should apply we should not get into the allocation at all.

Yours sincerely,

S.V. ALLEN

L'adjoint spécial du sous-ministre de production pour la Défense au sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

Special Assistant to Deputy Minister of Defence Production to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 21, 1951

Dear Mr. Heeney,

Before leaving on holidays Mr. Mackenzie asked me if I would acknowledge your letter of June 9th in which you outlined some of the political considerations involved in the diversion of Canadian supplies.

I think that in general officials in the Department are aware of the special needs of our NATO and other allies. Indeed a large number of specialists who have been drawn from industry to serve in this Department are spending a considerable portion of their time at the International Materials Conference discussions in Washington and as you know the main purpose of these meetings is not inconsistent with the objectives which you outline.

You will remember that from the outset we were opposed to the idea of a large number of countries being called into conference in order to attempt to work out international allocations. Nevertheless since the International Materials Conference has become a functioning group I think that we need not be ashamed of the contribution which we are making.

In the Pulp and Paper Committee we pressed for an emergency newsprint subcommittee and accepted its chairmanship. As you will remember we prevailed against the United States in order to get an emergency allocation of newsprint for France. In a statement which Mr. Howe made in the House of Commons on June 14th, he said in part:

"I think that no one will quarrel with the desirability of North America assuring that our allies have at least minimum amounts of newsprint available in order to combat the claims of communism."

Then referring to the probable further diversions that would be recommended by I.M.C. he said:

"It is obvious that North American consumers who are by far the heaviest consumers must expect some cut-back in order to provide this tonnage."

In the Non-Ferrous Metals field, when we saw that the various countries were bogging down in discussions our representatives tried to establish a small "ways and means committee" the objective of which would have been to provide ad hoc assistance to individual countries, whose requirements were particularly urgent. Also in this field, we have accepted the chairmanship of the Utilization and Conservation Committee.

I would hesitate to suggest that this Department, or indeed the Canadian Government should, on its own, attempt to formally appraise the relative merits of the large number of requests that are being put before us daily by representatives of friendly countries, all of them claiming that the lack of strategic materials is having an adverse effect on their defence supporting programmes. On the other hand we are, in an informal fashion, bringing to Canadian industry's attention the desirability of diverting as much of their supplies as possible to our allies. As an example of this I would like to quote a paragraph of a letter addressed to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Canada, by the Director of our Non-Ferrous Metals Division, and I might say that when he wrote this letter he had no knowledge of your letter under reference.

"Your reference to the Canadian Government barring Consolidated from entering the Japanese market at competitive prices hardly seems appropriate. Already 400 tons has been approved for export there, which is not necessarily the limit that will be approved. The view here is that in this present period of metal stringency, exports should be continuously under review to obtain a reasonable balance between continuing trade considerations and the supply of scarce raw materials to friendly countries involved in mutual Defence programs."

I could quote other examples of how we have through informal representations to Canadian industry influenced the direction of our exports. Our efforts on behalf of the British are well known and have proven reasonably fruitful. Just recently we arranged for a shipment of nickel to Luxembourg. This country is not only in the NATO group but is an important supplier of steel to Canada.

In your letter you make particular reference to the disappointment of certain French officials, as a result of their visit to the Non-Ferrous Metals Division.

As you may know, this particular meeting was called at the request of the French. They met with four representatives of the Non-Ferrous Metals Division including Dr. Monture, who has probably had more experience with international metal discussions than anyone else in Ottawa. Mr. Manion, our commercial secretary in Paris, who has been closely associated with these problems for over two years, was also present.

I am advised that the meeting was quite lengthy, that our representatives reviewed the overall position of each of the metals in which the French showed an interest; we explained that, with the exception of countries in the Russian orbit, there was nothing discriminatory about our export permit policy. We assured the French of our sympathy and expressed a willingness to use our good offices but explained that for the present actual arrangements for shipments have to be resolved with due regard to established contractual commitments of private companies.

The French had made a special case of copper at one of the regular meetings of the Franco-Canadian Trade Committee, noting that this year's receipts were likely to be a good deal less than their purchases of last year. This is actually the case but the reason is that Noranda, one of their suppliers has had to supply extra copper to their new brass mill and is also making heavier deliveries to Canadian Wire and Cable Company, both of which units produce items important in our defence supporting industries.

Anything surplus to our own screened requirements will of course be exported and it appears desirable that we permit the development of finishing capacity in Canada so that an ever increasing quantity of our natural resources is processed in this country rather than have everything exported in the primary form.

At the conclusion of the meeting in the Non-Ferrous Metals Division the French representatives expressed themselves as being grateful for the information, but it is our impression that we were not successful, nor apparently were our representatives at the Franco-Canadian Trade talks, in making the French understand that this Government is not yet determining quotas of exports for certain designated markets.

In your letter you remarked that although we did not give the French any material assistance in securing non-ferrous metals, we went on to discuss the possibilities of getting additional steel from France.

I don't believe that there was anything inappropriate in our approach. We do not exercise discriminatory control over our exports but the French Government does. If French importers can place orders in Canada for a share of our exportable supplies of non-ferrous metals we would not interfere with the exports, but if a Canadian importer wishes to secure surplus steel from France he could only do so if he were able to get a portion of a Canadian allocation established by the French Government.

In conclusion, I do not believe that at the present time we should assume formal direction over our exports, other than to ensure that they do not get into the hands of the Russian dominated countries or to implement I.M.C. recommendations that are acceptable to the government.

On the other hand we will continue to advise our producer-exporters concerning the governments' interests in the field of strategic materials and in this connection will keep in mind the information contained in your letter.[19]

Yours faithfully,

T.N. BEAUPRÉ

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, June 21, 1951

Dear Arnold [Heeney]:

With reference to your letter of June 9, with which you enclosed a copy of a letter addressed to Max Mackenzie on the question of allocating scarce materials, I did not have a chance to discuss this with Max prior to his departure on a week's fishing trip. I understand he briefed Beaupré before he left and I have discussed the question with Beaup. I have also talked this matter over with Harvey and Mitchell Sharp.

Insofar as this Department is concerned, we are anxious to maintain some control over the direction of our scarce commodities, such as newsprint, pulp, copper, lead, zinc, nickel, aluminum and asbestos. We were not in favour of I.M.C. when this agency was originally established, but we are changing our minds and, depending on performance, we believe that I.M.C. can do a very valuable service in screening requests for scarce materials. It is obvious that Canada cannot take care of the demands from all our friends for the above materials. Somebody must go short and we would hesitate to accept the responsibility of judging the essentiality of the claims. If we were engaged in all out war this would be a comparatively straightforward procedure, but, under present conditions, where most of our materials are still being used for normal civilian purposes or for stockpiling, it becomes very difficult to choose between a fractional horsepower motor manufacturer in Italy and a fractional horsepower motor manufacturer in any other country. At the moment we are using the I.M.C. as a defense and we refer most of our inquirers to this agency. On the other hand, we would like to have enough autonomy over the distribution and export of our strategic materials to enable us to take care of fair and reasonable requests from our friends. Up to date, we have been able to do this by persuasion rather than by directives, and I believe this is the best policy for the present period.

We have had considerable success along these lines. For example, Sir John Henry Woods was, I believe, able to negotiate for some 2,500 tons of copper for shipment to the United Kingdom, through the efforts of George Bateman. In the same way, we recently have arranged for some nickel for Luxembourg and we are hopeful that we will be able to take care of the residual requirements of copper for New Zealand after Mr. Bowden has explored the possibility of obtaining supplies from the United States and the United Kingdom.

We were disappointed that we were unable to take care of the French copper requirements. I still think something can be done for the French, as our own demands may taper off as a result of the slowing down of Canadian business and the effect of the Canadian Order Approval system. I propose to follow this matter up with Mr. Bateman on his next visit to Ottawa. I also propose to have a talk with Max on his return to duty next week.

Yours sincerely,
WM. FREDERICK BULL

TELEGRAM EX-1320 Ottawa, June 25, 1951

Following for Mr. S.D. Pierce, Director, Department of Defence Production, 2001 Connecticut Avenue, Washington, D.C. from T.N. Beaupré, Special Assistant to the Deputy Minister, Department of Defence Production. Begins: The following is a brief outline of the discussions which were held yesterday (June 22nd) with the Americans:

On the Canadian side were Mr. Howe, Bull, Sharp, Mackenzie and myself, with Hewett and Fowler sitting in on the afternoon session. The U.S. side included Eric Johnston. Kenneth Clark, his assistant, Griffith Johnson, his Economic Adviser and Bliss the U.S. Minister of the Embassy.

Eric Johnston opened the discussions, which were immediately classed as being informal and frank, by outlining the U.S. stabilization programme. In doing so he referred to three main fields: commodity prices, wages and imported raw materials. Griffith Johnson reviewed the same fields in somewhat greater detail and appeared reasonably hopeful that the credit controls and tax bill which they were asking Congress to authorize would in addition to the direct controls make a significant contribution to stabilized economy.

Eric Johnston however admitted quite frankly that he did not believe that the present Congress was prepared to do the necessary and for this reason, and also because of the growing size of the defence programme, he felt that there was bound to be considerable inflationary pressure this year, 1951-1952. Sharp, noting that all American planning appeared to be based on a firm conviction of the severe inflationary pressures, asked the Americans for the basis of their conviction. He suggested that much of the current inflationary atmosphere might be attributed to the alarmists' reports that were being released by the U.S. administration. They referred to some factors which were no doubt pertinent but seemed to admit reasonably freely that they had to keep shouting wolf if there was to be any hope of Congress stiffening its back.

They then spoke of their concern of rising Canadian prices. Mr. Howe pointed out that in the price field Canada only dominated nickel and newsprint and he suggested that there was little likelihood of any further increases in either of these commodities during the coming year. When Johnston referred to increases in the other non-ferrous metals Mr. Howe pointed out that Canadians took their prices from the U.S. Metal Exchange and suggested that Johnston might consider closing the Exchange.

As the discussion proceeded however it became apparent that Johnston's visit was primarily to discuss pricing in the Non-Ferrous Metals field. He pointed out that because Chile found it possible to secure better prices for a significant portion of its exports they had forced the Americans into a 27½¢ price as opposed to the previous 24¢ price. He also noted that Canada immediately increased its price to 27½¢, although he argued that there was no necessity for Canadian producers seeking higher prices. He admitted however that this was now history but that already he had reports that the British were paying 29¢ and 30¢ for Chilean copper and he felt confident that in a very few months Chile would be back at the U.S. for a higher price. He felt that if they were forced to pay a higher price and the Canadian price allowed to meet it, and England again offered 01¢ or 02¢ more in order to get supplies, that there would be no termination to the price spiral. He admitted that the I.M.C. was working in this field but did not appear optimistic that they would achieve any significant success and asked whether or not we would be prepared to sit down with the Americans and British in order to seek some solution to supply and price problems, particularly in the Non-Ferrous Metals field. We suggested that the solution to this problem rested in the hands of the two main purchasers, i.e., the United Kingdom and the United States, but that if they wished us to join them in discussions we would be prepared to do so. Johnston noted that he had not yet approached the British on the subject but would do so and advise us further. Johnston seemed well satisfied with this answer and made it apparent that as this was the main purpose of his visit his trip had been successful.

There was of course some reference to the price of newsprint but Johnston did not appear anxious to make an issue of this subject.

We referred to our anxiety concerning the price of beef and Johnston pointed out that although they were anxious to get as much of our beef as possible he did not wish to duly embarrass us and indicated that the American side would be prepared to explore the situation further. We did not think however that any action was necessary at the present time.

Griffith Johnson explained that as a result of the coming into effect of the manufacturers pricing order there would be a great many changes in prices of individual items, some going up some going down. If strange things seemed to be happening to prices of U.S. goods imported into Canada we were not to be alarmed.

Johnston asked whether or not we felt that the present machinery for keeping each other informed was satisfactory and it was agreed that there was no necessity for anything further although Johnston suggested that our people in Washington who were particularly interested in this subject should avail themselves of the opportunity of dropping in on Griffith Johnson any time they wished.

Mr. Howe also told Eric Johnston that he would like you to call in on him and Eric Johnston assured Mr. Howe that he would be glad to meet you.

Please repeat to John H. English. Ends.

INTERNATIONAL MATERIALS CONFERENCE — COPPER

Our troubles in connection with the International Materials Conference are continuing and at present seem to be more active in the Copper Committee. I attended a meeting on this subject on Friday morning. Others present included Beaupré, Harvey, Wolfson (for Deutsch), Hooton, and Stan Allen himself from Washington.

2. Our representatives in Washington have been resisting a cut-and-dried formula which gives the various countries concerned whatever copper they may need for defence and part of what they need for stockpiling and then divides the remainder up on the basis of consumption in 1950. Our people say, not without reason, that the Canadian economy is developing very rapidly, that large quantities of copper are going into the development of Canadian resources that are defence-supporting in the best sense (iron ore, titanium, oil, hydro electricity, etc), and that this sort of thing ought to be taken into account by IMC either in the formula used or as an adjustment to the formula. The United States position is unfortunately confused. It never seems quite sure whether the U.S. will accept a strict formula (which their lower level officials usually want) or whether at the last moment they would insist on all sorts of escape clauses with themselves. This at any rate is the position in copper.

3. The logic of our position is, I think, strong. Unfortunately it emerged in Friday's meeting that the Department of Defence Production have not done, indeed have not attempted to do, their statistical homework. They talk in broad terms about our need for copper for development and defence-supporting purposes but have no notion how much copper is in fact going into these uses or likely to go there. Thus they seem to me to be in an extremely weak bargaining position.

4. Current discussion in the Copper Committee focuses on the first allocation period, i.e. the fourth quarter of 1951. Canada has put in a "requirement" of 31,000 tons. Our people are willing to reduce this "requirement" to 28,000 tons not because they feel ready to reduce actual consumption to the extent of the difference but because there are inventories which could be used up without cutting into actual consumption. On the other hand the Committee is offering us 24,275 tons and even this is above what we are actually entitled to on the basis of the formula which is probably going to be used; it would only give us about 23,000 tons. I get the impression that on the basis of the "offer" of the Committee we are being treated more generously than the United States or the United Kingdom.

5. The gap to be bridged is of course the difference between the 28,000 tons that our people feel willing to accept and the 24,275 tons that the Committee has offered. Beaupré will be raising this question with Mr. Howe who might possibly (although not probably) take it up in Cabinet.

6. I have told Beaupré that, until his Department has done their homework and produced actual figures for the use of copper in defence-supporting industries in Canada, I can see no basis of judgment as to whether our "requirements" of 31,000 tons or 28,000 tons are defensible.[20] In the meanwhile I do not see how we can defend any figure higher than that which the Committee has offered us. (Allen thinks we might be able to get something between this and 28,000 tons by haggling and bargaining). Meanwhile Beaupré (who, I am sure, fully agrees with my point of view), is putting his research division to work on the problem in conjunction with his Metals Division.

CONFIDENTIAL [Ottawa], September 12, 1951

ALLOCATIONS OF NEWSPRINT — INTERNATIONAL MATERIALS CONFERENCE (WASHINGTON)

This is to confirm the decision which you reached when I discussed this matter with you recently and also to warn you of a possible implication.

2. You will recall that two opposing principles have been put forward in the Washington Committee. Some countries, led by the United Kingdom and France, wish to see the Committee bring about a substantial re-distribution of newsprint amongst major countries — to correct a world-wide "maldistribution" of supplies. The representatives of the United States and Canada have, however, argued that such a general re-distribution is impracticable both because there is no accepted or acceptable basis for bringing it about and also because it would involve a degree of government interference in newsprint sales on the North American continent which would not be acceptable either to producers or consumers.

3. The immediate issue arises over whether there should be a second emergency allocation, amounting to some 18,000 tons, or whether something much more ambitious should be attempted, involving more than ten times this amount. (You will remember that the first allocation, which took place early in July, involved 10,000 tons). I understand that you feel that allocations should be kept on an emergency basis, rather than a general redistribution basis, and our representative in Washington on the Pulp and Paper Committee has been so informed. The same view is, of course, held by Mr. M.W. Mackenzie and Mr. R.M. Fowler.

4. The implication about which I wanted to warn you is as follows. It involves France.

5. Almost all of the first allocation of 10,000 tons and the greater part of the proposed second allocation of 18,000 tons would be destined to go to countries that were relatively weak commercially and where, for some reason or another, newsprint supplies were threatening to fall substantially below the level of the recent past, producing a real emergency. Most of these countries happen to be around the edge of the iron curtain — running from the Philippines to Yugoslavia. Germany has been included because of the specially disturbed conditions there; the proposed allocation to Germany is 5,000 tons.

6. You will recall that shortly before the French elections last June the French authorities made very strong representations to get an emergency allocation and in the end obtained 3,000 tons before any allocation had been given to any other country. Under the proposed second allocation the French would get some 2,000 additional tons (5,000 tons in all). Even this involves a serious stretch of the "emergency" principle on which the Committee is working. According to Mr. Fowler the French stocks of newsprint are indeed very low at present (this is the only justification of a further allocation) but they will stay low as long as the French authorities do not take reasonable steps to maintain reasonable stocks and distribution.

7. The French representative at the Washington Committee is insisting on a substantially larger allocation — something like 8,500 tons. Our representatives on the Committee feel that this is quite unreasonable in relationship to all the other allocations. They anticipate that the French authorities are likely to try to exert the same pressure that they did last June outside the Committee in order to get their allocation increased. It seems to me quite possible that the matter may be raised informally during the coming week when French Ministers and high French officials are in Ottawa for the coming North Atlantic Council meeting.

8. Our representatives in Washington hope very much that we will back up the stand they have taken which they already consider to be specially favourable to France. If the French were always able to get additional allocations by bringing pressure to bear in Ottawa, Washington, and other quarters, the work of the allocation Committee would be undermined.

INTERNATIONAL MATERIALS CONFERENCE

I have recently had a chance to review the position and prospects of IMC with Sydney Pierce, George Bateman and Tom Beaupré and, before my probable departure for overseas, I want to make this general report to you.

2. You will remember that the proposal for an International Materials Conference came up when Mr. Attlee was visiting Mr. Truman last December. At that time our officials chiefly concerned (in the Department of Trade and Commerce) very much doubted whether a large organization including many countries could produce useful results under present circumstances. They were strongly in favour of far less formal arrangements and hoped that, as far as the chief Canadian exports were concerned, informal agreement could be reached between U.S., U.K. and Canada. It should be added, in defence of the position that we were taking at that time, that the United Kingdom representatives claimed they were faced with disaster unless they got additional supplies of certain scarce materials within a few weeks, or at most a few months, and it seemed to us quite impossible that elaborate international arrangements could meet their needs.

[21] Copie envoyée au premier ministre, le 14 septembre 1951./Copy sent to Prime Minister on September 14, 1951.

3. I am sure it would still be the view of our officials chiefly concerned (now in the Department of Defence Production) that emergency requirements would have to be met on an ad hoc bi-lateral or tri-lateral basis. Never-the-less the IMC is achieving a degree of success beyond our expectations. An international allocation of copper has been agreed upon for the fourth quarter of 1951. Two emergency allocations of newsprint have been agreed upon (in addition to the special allocation to France last June) and, while the work of the Conference has bogged down in some fields (e.g. wool), it seems to be making reasonable, if slow, progress in others.

4. As a result of these modest successes and others that may come along, the Canadian attitude towards the Conference will no doubt undergo a gradual change. The Conference will assume increased importance. It may be expected to exercise an increasing influence over some of our most important exports (base metals and pulp and paper) and over a few of our important imports. This is a matter of significance to Canada both economically and politically.

5. Therefore, I had been planning to take an increasing interest in IMC and possibly, on occasion, to take some initiative. The only initiative this Department has ever taken has been on one or two occasions in relation to newsprint. During the past few months the Division has suffered from a shortage of staff and we have been able to do little but act as a Post Office, scarcely glancing at the voluminous material on the subject. Very recently, however, I was able to appoint a junior officer (Reynolds) to give a good deal of his time to the subject in the hope that he would be able to brief me and keep me abreast of important developments.

6. I am afraid these plans will have to be set aside for the time being, if I go overseas. Griffin will be too occupied with a host of other things during my absence and, unfortunately, this is one of the fields where I have special personal advantages. Not only did I work on allocation matters during the last war but, in the course of that work, had a lot to do with most of the officials in the Department of Defence Production who happen to be specially concerned to-day: Mackenzie, Pierce, English, Allen, Fowler, Hewett, Monture and Sissons. If our Department is going to exercise any influence in the field it will, I believe, have to be largely on a personal basis. Having myself served with a temporary specialist organization (WPTB), I know how ready such an organization is to resist and resent intrusions by the diplomats!

7. I have from time to time urged Allen to come up to Ottawa fairly frequently. His visits can easily become occasions on which there is a general interdepartmental discussion of IMC issues and problems. I know that Allen himself welcomes these opportunities, feeling that most of his instructions come from highly specialized sources such as Fowler in the field of pulp and paper and Hewett in the field of metals, and that broader views may not always be taken into account.

8. Allen is planning another of his visits in a few weeks time, during my absence. I have told him that I will, of course, expect him to come to this Department to see Griffin and Reynolds. I have also taken the liberty of suggesting that he might get in touch with you to see if you would like to have a talk with him. I think it might be useful if you could manage to do so.

9. It is possible you might wish to show this memorandum to the Minister.[22]

INTERNATIONAL MATERIALS CONFERENCE

On October 23rd M.W. Mackenzie called a meeting to discuss general IMC matters with Stan Allen, who is visiting Ottawa this week. Beaupré, Harvey, Weeks, Deutsch and a number of others including technical people were present as well as Griffin and Reynolds. Mackenzie stressed the fact that although we did not want IMC, we now had it and should strive to make it work.

2. The main subjects discussed were:

(1) The problem of incentive production — Will it be possible to retain part of any production of commodities entered into on an uneconomic basis in the light of critical shortages or will IMC allocations be reduced in amount according to the production retained from this subsidized production? If the latter is the case, the country concerned would be merely exchanging a cheap product for an expensive one. It was agreed that this penalty should not be imposed and that some formula for partial retention of the lower cost allocation should be worked out.

(2) The possibility of putting the Central Group on a more realistic basis as a general sounding board. No decision was reached but it was generally agreed, as a preliminary step, that discussion with the British, French and Americans might take place in Washington on an Ambassadorial or Ministerial level. It was felt that such discussion was vital since the work in the Committees was being done largely by technical experts.

(3) It was agreed that Canada should accept chairmanship of one of the Committees, preferably either copper or nickel. Allen favoured the Copper Committee.

Mr. Plumptre Thanks — I am glad to have this report & will be happy to see Allen when he comes up I have sent a copy of this to the Minister We should try to keep in touch A.D.P.H[eeney]. Oct 10

Hewett, however, favoured nickel, stressing that since we are the great producer it is in our interest to get unanimity, and if the Canadian member were chairman he would be in a position to strive for agreement. In the Copper Committee, where we will need to stress our own interest, Hewett felt that for the Canadian member to be chairman would be rather awkward. The whole question is to be discussed with Mr. Howe. Allen pointed out that while we are almost sure of being offered the copper chairmanship, he did not know whether the nickel chairmanship would be offered to us.[23]

(4) The question of Canada contributing personnel to the Secretariat. It was decided that we should make every effort to do so.[24]

INTERNATIONAL MATERIALS CONFERENCE

One of the questions raised in IMC has been Canada's acceptance of the chairmanship of one of the Commodity Committees. Recently M.W. Mackenzie called an interdepartmental meeting to discuss general IMC matters with Allen. Beaupré, Harvey, Weeks, Deutsch and a number of technical people were present as well as myself and Reynolds. The meeting recommended that Canada should accept the chairmanship of one of the less controversial of the committees, preferably nickel, it being favoured since, as chairman, our delegate would be able to strive for the unanimity vital to Canada's interest as the dominant producer.

Mr. Howe has agreed to this recommendation and Allen has been instructed to accept the chairmanship of the Nickel Committee if it is formally offered to him.

CANADIAN PLAN FOR NEWSPRINT ALLOCATION IN IMC

Discussion in the Pulp and Paper Committee of IMC has of late tended to centre on whether the Committee should restrict itself in 1952 to emergency allocations, or whether it should undertake to recommend an equitable redistribution of the world's supply of newsprint. A number of countries, including the United Kingdom and France, intimated that their continuing membership in the Committee depended upon an increase in the scope of allocations made by the Committee. The United States, on the other hand, would never accept redistribution of the world's supply. A compromise solution appeared necessary if the divergent views of the members of the Committee were to be reconciled.

2. The Canadian member of the Committee recently formulated a plan which should go a long way towards providing a solution. He proposed that during the next allocation period, covering the first six months of 1952, allocations should take two forms:

(a) strictly emergency as in the past and,

(b) allocations of less than emergency character to a limited number of countries to which, in the opinion of the Committee, it is internationally desirable that allocations should go.

Category (b) allocations would be fulfilled on a contractual basis with prices in line with newsprint prices in the country making the purchase. Category (a) allocations would be much less in tonnage than category (b) allocations which for the six month period will total 50,000 tons (compared with a total allocation of 28,800 tons in 1951).

3. A country seeking an allocation of newsprint would apply to the Committee. If the application were accepted the Committee would decide whether it should be dealt with under category (a) or category (b). Allocations approved by the Committee would be passed on to the Pulp and Paper Division of Defence Production which would ensure that the Canadian mills take on commercial contracts consistent with the category (b) recommendations. The incentive of firm contracts and good prices should ensure the cooperation of the mills. However, mills which refused to conclude contracts would be directed by Defence Production to provide category (a) tonnages. The implementation of (a) tonnages would be made possible by these Government directives and also through purchases by the Canadian Government on behalf of the country of allocation.

4. All members of the Committee have now approved the scheme in principle, and the plan in final form will shortly be submitted to each member government for approval. United States approval seems assured since the plan, without attempting to redistribute the newsprint supply of the world, would reduce criticism of the United States based on its disproportionate use of newsprint. The plan should hold out sufficient inducement to ensure United Kingdom and French support. Norway and Sweden were invited to participate in the scheme as producers but as yet have not responded to the offer.

III. TORQUAY DISCUSSIONS; REPORT

9. The Chairman of the Tariff Board said the discussions at Torquay had differed substantially from those at Geneva and Annecy in three respects: the Geneva Schedules had been due to expire in January 1951 and their extension had to be discussed; there were a number of countries wishing to accede, of which the most important was Western Germany, and the total number of countries involved was considerably greater.

So far as the Geneva Schedules were concerned, the position before January was that it was permissible for any country to withdraw a concession if it had found it too onerous. It had been agreed in advance that Canada would not withdraw any but it was found that a very large number of items were being withdrawn by many countries, including the United Kingdom and France. Several items were of substantial importance to Canada although in the end the only item of any real concern was the South African concession of silk stockings. In general it proved possible to renegotiate the schedules and adequate compensation had been secured for the items withdrawn. In some instances, the compensation had been better than the original concession.

Of the 38 countries that accepted invitations to Torquay, two did not turn up and two took no part in tariff negotiations. With another 14 it was felt that no substantial basis for negotiation by Canada existed. As a result, Canada carried on negotiations with 20 countries. An earnest effort was made to get an agreement with the Benelux countries, which negotiated as a unit. The Canadian offer included as its principal item a reduction on window glass. At Geneva, the M.F.N. rate had been cut from 15% to 10% and the offer was 7 1/2%. The principal items on which compensation was sought in return were flour and salmon. Benelux, however, wanted to get the rate cut to 5% on window glass and were not prepared to make an offer that appeared to be adequate. As a result, it was not possible to conclude a new agreement.

With Cuba, it had been hoped to negotiate on quite a broad scale and the initial move was made on September 28. Nothing was, however, heard from Cuba until February. Their indication then was that unless Canada withdrew its preference margins on sugar, molasses, rum, cigars and other items they would withdraw their concessions. When the delegation declined to negotiate on that basis, Cuba next suggested a tariff quota on raw sugar and finally a bulk purchase. In discussions on an allocated bulk purchase, Cuba offered no real concessions, and negotiations were broken off. It was felt in Ottawa that the consequences of a failure to reach any understanding with Cuba would be so serious that a new effort was made on the basis of an allocated purchase of 75,000 tons. Cuba accepted, giving compensation for four items they were going to withdraw, and the schedule was renewed for a 3-year period. The agreement for the allocated purchase was outside the GATT arrangements. It seemed probable that there would be renewed difficulties with Cuba at the end of the 3-year period and that it would be hard for the government to extricate itself from bulk purchasing.[25]

With 16 countries, negotiations were successfully concluded. The countries were: Austria, Denmark, the Dominican Republic, France, Germany, Haiti, Indonesia, India, Italy, Korea, the Philippines, Peru, Sweden, Turkey and the United States. Of the agreements the most interesting were those with the United States, France, Germany, the Dominican Republic and Peru.

The delegation had been particularly anxious to make a new agreement with the U.S.A., partly because it was felt that this would be the last opportunity under the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. After some preliminary skirmishes and six weeks of informal discussions, formal talks began of a fairly substantial character. In all previous tariff arrangements between Canada and the United States, four items had figured: potatoes, cattle, timber and base metals. It had been felt that there was no chance of getting any new concession on potatoes. So far as cattle were concerned, no particular effort was made on the advice of the Department of Agriculture. In the case of base metals, it was thought that something might be secured but not aluminum. It had been doubted whether anything would be possible on dairy products and they had felt there was no real prospect in connection with filleted fish. The delegation considered, however, that it was worth while making a good effort and it was indicated that very substantial concessions would be offered if the United States made new provisions for potatoes, cheese, douglas fir plywood, birch plywood and aluminum. After reference to Washington, the United States delegation indicated that potatoes, cheese and aluminum were out; that something might be possible on douglas fir plywood but not on birch plywood. It was also indicated that substantial concessions would have to be forthcoming from Canada. After protracted discussion, and without having to concede much more than had been intended, the arrangement with the United States finally included a concession on fish, a full 50% reduction on douglas fir plywood, and a reduction on birch plywood that was greater than had originally been sought. Both Canada and the United States came down to 15% on canned salmon, which would operate on balance to the advantage of Canada. Altogether a very large schedule resulted. On a number of chemicals the full 50% reduction was arranged and in the entire industrial list there were many cuts. It had not been possible to reach any arrangement on paper. For fruit and vegetables, the only arrangement of interest applied to apples. Our duty was dropped from 37 1/2¢ to 18 3/4¢ and the United States duty to 12 1/2¢. Altogether it was felt that the U.S. barrel had been scraped pretty well clean of items of consequence to Canada.

Of the agreements with other countries, particularly good ones had been made with France and Germany. The whole range of the fifteen agreements affected farm products, processed farm products, fishery products, forest products and metals.

10. Mr. McKinnon said that, on British preferences, the United Kingdom had been more rigid at Torquay than at Geneva. The President of the Board of Trade had gone to Torquay twice and had urged that no margins of preference be given up, either de facto margins or bound margins. The Commonwealth countries other than Canada had tried to maintain a solid front on this. Mr. Wilson had made efforts to have the Canadian delegation instructed to take a similar position but the delegation remained out of the Commonwealth meetings. It was indicated that Canada would not refuse to give up any margin of preference if it would help in the conclusion of an agreement. In substance the line was that the delegation had gone to Torquay to negotiate with other countries and that the negotiations had to contemplate the possibility of impairing the British margins. The United States had offered Australia the full 50% reduction on wool and it had been thought that Australia would not be able to resist the attraction of an agreement with such an item included. However, in the event no agreements were negotiated with the United States by the United Kingdom, Australia or South Africa. The old schedules were simply continued. In the case of the United Kingdom, the United States had presented a list of concessions that was so sweeping that the United Kingdom had decided there was no possibility that they could give adequate compensation. It had to be recognized that the Labour Party in the United Kingdom was in many ways quite as strongly attached to protection as was the Conservative Party. Importance was attached not only to protection in the U.K. market but also to protection of the preferred position of British producers in other Commonwealth markets.

In the discussions at Torquay, one of the limiting factors had been the U.S. method of operation. The U.S. Trade Agreements Committee was present at Torquay but it did not enter into any negotiations or discussions. The U.S. negotiating teams carried on the discussions with the interested countries and then took the proposals to the Trade Agreements Committee. In not a few instances this meant that, while the Canadian negotiators might be able to convince the U.S. negotiating team and conceivably might have been able to convince the Trade Agreements Committee, the U.S. negotiating team was the one that had to attempt to persuade the Committee to acceptance of the Canadian proposal. Arrangements that might have been quite acceptable and advantageous often fell at this hurdle. The Trade Agreements Committee was established by statute and consisted of about 12 persons representing various departments of the U.S. government. The members voted as representatives of their departments and acted more or less as a jury or a judicial board.

The agreements would be open for signature at the U.N. Headquarters on May 7 and would be published on May 9. They would become operative on June 6.

It seemed probable that this represented the last round of multilateral discussions under GATT. From this point forward, it was probable that discussions would be bilateral. The accomplishment of the sessions under GATT had been quite substantical. Very great reductions had been effected in the tariffs of countries which represented about 95% of world trade. Moreover, the reductions were bound for three years.

11. The Committee, after considerable discussion, noted the report of the Chairman of the Tariff Board concerning trade discussions at Torquay.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL London, June 20, 1951

Dear Wynne [Plumptre]:

I duly received your despatch No. E.2285† of June 11th, with regard to the proposed meeting of Canadian and United States officials to discuss matters coming up at the Sixth Session of the Contracting Parties to GATT, which is opening in Geneva on September 17th.

The only one of the topics for discussion on which I think it would be useful for you to have my comments is that pertaining to the future of GATT. In this connection I recently had occasion to set out my views in a personal and confidential letter to Mr. Eric Wyndham White, Executive Secretary, ICITO. I am therefore enclosing for your information copy of the personal and confidential letter which I received from Mr. Wyndham White, dated May 17th, and copy of my personal and confidential reply of May 24th. You will note that Mr. Wyndham White raised the questions relating to the future of GATT, and that I replied giving him my views as to what I thought should be the position taken in the interests not of any one country but of GATT as a whole.

I would ask you to ignore the particular references to the conflicting ideologies prevailing in Europe and North America, since I know that your own predilections are distinctly in favour of the European school. What I want to do is to keep ideologies out of GATT and to make it an increasingly useful international instrument. I am sure that you yourself will be the first to agree that in our approach to commercial policy questions, our general position should be closer to that of the United States than of any of the European countries. This I think is more important than the adherence to any particular theory concerning international trade.

I hope that this exchange of correspondence will be of some use to you. I have had to mark this letter "Personal and Confidential" on account of the nature of my exchange of views with Wyndham White, but I thought it desirable that you should know what has been passing through both our minds.

With kindest regards and best wishes.

Yours sincerely,
DANA [WILGRESS]

Executive Secretary, Interim Commission for the International Trade Organization, to High Commissioner in United Kingdom

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL Geneva, May 17, 1951

Dear Dana [Wilgress],

Although it is clear that the present unsettled state of affairs makes it very difficult to envisage what changes there may be in the attitudes of governments between now and the Sixth Session towards the General Agreement, I have been giving some thought to what sort of proposals might form the basis of discussion at the Sixth Session on the future arrangements for the administration of the General Agreement.

These arrangements can, it seems to me, be considered apart from the question as to whether governments intend to proceed to put the Agreement into definitive application. Moreover, I think that arrangements can be worked out which would not drastically differ from the present set-up but would provide a solid basis for the existing structure and a basis for further expansion later if that became desirable.

The first fruits of my consideration of the problem are contained in the attached paper. It seems to me that from a legal point of view it would be quite feasible to proceed by way of a simple decision of the Contracting Parties. This would have the advantage of not involving the drafting of a legal instrument which would be required to be ratified and the entry into force of which would also involve delay and possibly some legal complications. As regards the substance of the proposal, you will see that it does not entail any change in the attributions or procedures of the Contracting Parties except that I have inserted the proposal for the establishment of a Standing Committee. This particular proposal could be omitted if the decision of the Contracting Parties were unfavourable to the establishment of such a Committee. The decision would only require minor amendment if this were the case. It follows from this approach that no amendment of the General Agreement would be necessary to give effect to the decision.

As regards other amendments to the Agreement, I should have thought that it would be desirable at this point to do as little as possible. However, it might be feasible to meet the point of view of those contracting parties who feel that the Agreement in its present form is somewhat unbalanced if some general language on the question of economic development and full employment is not inserted. What I have specifically in mind is the insertion in an appropriate place, perhaps as an addition to Article XXII, of provision for consultation between the Contracting Parties, upon the initiative of any one or more of them, with a view to appropriate measures being taken by contracting parties against the international spread of a decline in employment, production or demand. As regards economic development, there might be introduced into the Agreement a general provision on the lines of paragraph 1 of Article 10 of the Havana Charter.

I should be grateful to have your views on these various suggestions since it seems to me that it will be in the interests of all concerned if the discussions in September on these questions could be directed to specific and limited proposals rather than ranging over a broad and indefinite field.

Yours ever,

ERIC [WYNDHAM WHITE]

P.S. I have not sent this to Ottawa; I thought perhaps you might like to have a chance to comment on it first.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL London, May 24, 1951

Dear Eric [Wyndham White]:

I have read over with interest your personal and confidential letter of 17th May, particularly the draft decision relating to the administration of the General Agreement which was enclosed with your letter.

You are very wise to be giving early attention to the sort of proposals which might form the basis of discussion at the Sixth Session in September on the future arrangements for the administration of the General Agreement. I think the experience of the last session shows the need for careful preparation before each step is taken.

I have no comments on the draft decision which you enclosed. It seems to meet the requirements very well, and I like the idea of setting forth the international administration as a whole. This serves to place the proposed Standing Committee in proper perspective, and gives the desired standing to a Permanent Secretariat which is one of the chief objects we wish to achieve.

I am glad you have come to the conclusion that from a legal point of view it is possible to proceed by way of a simple decision of the Contracting Parties. This will save a lot of trouble, since anything requiring ratification or anything in the nature of an amendment to the Agreement would have unduly complicated the whole approach to what is after all really a consolidation of developments over the past few years.

I now come to the more important question of substantive amendments to the Agreement. In my view the whole future of the General Agreement depends upon the manner in which this difficult question is approached, and that is why I think the Sixth Session will be so important in the history of GATT.

I quite agree that the administrative arrangements can be considered apart from the question of whether governments intend to proceed to put the General Agreement into definitive application. On the other hand, the standing of the General Agreement and its future as a recognized international instrument depends, in my view, on keeping ever before governments the prospect that the Agreement will eventually be definitively applied. For this reason it is almost vital that the United States Government should continue to declare their intention of applying the Agreement definitively whenever it is possible to have Congress pass the Customs Simplification Bill and other consequential legislation.

We must learn from the mistakes of the past. It is quite clear that continued United States support for GATT will not be forthcoming if we incorporate into the General Agreement provisions of the Havana Charter which are repugnant to American opinion. Among such provisions I would cite the full employment provisions, paragraph 4(b) of Article 21 (the domestic policy provision), the more specific provisions relating to subsidies, and the chapter on commodity agreements.

These provisions have a particular appeal to the countries of Western Europe who have been most influenced by the ideas of the late Lord Keynes. What we have to realize is that these ideas have not secured anywhere near the same foothold on the North American continent, and in fact are anathema to the liberal school of thought often designated by the term "free enterprise". We hear a lot of talk about American free enterprise being opposed to European socialism, but the clash in reality is between economic liberalism and managed economies. What we have to do in GATT is to try to steer a middle course between the two and not become involved too much one way or the other.

The provisions I have cited as appealing particularly to the managed economy school of thought also appeal to the under-developed countries, whose pet provisions of the Havana Charter are those concerning economic development. It is easy to obtain a majority in support of the inclusion of many of the provisions dear to the managed economy school by throwing in also the economic development provisions. The result would be in the end a General Agreement as repugnant to the United States opinion as the Havana Charter. I would have no great objection to an addition to Article XXII of a provision for consultation in case of a decline in employment, production or demand, nor would I have any strong objection to the inclusion of such a general and rather meaningless provision as paragraph 1 of Article 10 of the Havana Charter. I fear, however, that if at an early stage of the Sixth Session there was a proposal to include such provisions, it would merely whet the appetite of many of the Contracting Parties for more, and the rot would set in with fatal results to the whole cause we have at heart. In my view, such proposals should only come at a stage somewhat similar to that which was represented by the Coordinating Committee at Havana, namely as a last attempt to reach a compromise.

The United States Delegation is going to have a difficult time to resist additions to the General Agreement. The only support they can rely on would be that of the Canadian Delegation. Since one cannot always be sure of the quality of the United States representation, it may be necessary for you at times to step out of your role as Executive Secretary and give the United States Delegation friendly advice as coming from one who has the interests of the General Agreement so much at heart.

I would think that the proper tactics to adopt are to take a firm stand against any additions to the General Agreement. It could be argued that we have got along very well with the Agreement as it now stands; that we have been successful because we have not been attempting to do as much as was envisaged for the ITO; that if we add on to our organization functions originally intended for an ambitious organization like the ITO, we may break the back of a small organization based on the administration of an instrument which is now only receiving provisional application.

From this one could go on to argue that there is no need to add the provisions of the General Agreement, because most of the other provisions of the Havana Charter are being administered by other international bodies. For instance, the Economic and Social Council has been giving active attention to full employment. Economic development is also being dealt with by the same body and by other organizations. An organization is in process of development in Washington for dealing with commodities. It is true this organization is at present only concerned with raw materials, but it would be a simple matter to have it later on deal with basic foodstuffs. There only remains restrictive business practices, but this chapter of the Havana Charter was the special pet of North America and the North American delegations are willing to forego the addition of this chapter if other countries will forego the addition of provisions of the Havana Charter which are of special interest to them.

In my view, the General Agreement has succeeded because there is great need for a code of conduct regulating international trade. It is when we endeavour to go beyond the administration of that code of conduct to give effect to more positive provisions that we will land in trouble, simply because then we run up against the irreconcilable differences between opposing schools of economic thought.

Coombs argued very effectively at London, Geneva, and Havana, that the original United States proposals were too negative. They consisted merely of a series of "don'ts". He urged, therefore that we include some positive provisions so that the Havana Charter contained a series of "shalls". It is too much to expect the United States, representing as it does one-half of the world's economy, to swallow this series of "shalls" as the price of having the other countries swallow the "don'ts".

We have achieved in GATT an instrument which I believe will in course of time be acceptable to American opinion. We must not jeopardize this chance by pursuing what experience has proved to be wrong. The chief fallacy of Coombs was that it is often difficult to combine positive with negative functions. No one would think of condemning the Criminal Code because it is entirely negative in character, nor would one think of fastening on to Courts of Justice responsible for administering the Criminal Code the additional burden of running institutions designed to remove the causes of crime. The latter more positive functions rightly belong to other bodies. Let us, therefore, leave to ECOSOC and other international organizations the positive functions Coombs had in mind, and keep alive what already has proved to be a code of conduct which the important trading nations of the world can accept. There would not be 38 Contracting Parties to the GATT if this was not the case.

I hope you will excuse this rather lengthy letter, but I did want to make clear to you how I feel about these important matters. A great deal will depend upon how you yourself approach these problems during the coming months.

With kindest regards and all good wishes,

Yours sincerely,

L.D. WILGRESS

P.S. It is important also to bear in mind that the United Kingdom are anxious to have the General Agreement thrown open for amendment so that they can attempt to have removed the ban on increases in preferences.

DISCUSSIONS IN OTTAWA WITH U.S. OFFICIALS CONCERNING NEXT SESSION OF CONTRACTING PARTIES TO GATT

These informal discussions, suggested by the U.S., were held in Ottawa on June 25th and 26th. On the U.S. side the following officials participated; Mr. John M. Leddy, Mr. Carl Course, Mr. W.T.M. Beal, all of the State Department; Mr. Woodbury Willoughby and Mr. A.E. Frank of the U.S. Embassy.

2. To open the discussions a meeting of the Interdepartmental Committee on External Trade Policy had been arranged. More detailed discussions subsequently took place at meetings of the Interdepartmental Subcommittee on External Trade Policy. Some of the salient points which arose during the discussions are briefly record in this letter.

3. The main question considered at the opening meeting was how the principles of the GATT might best be sustained and carried forward.

4. Mr. Leddy said that the demise of the ITO, and the failure of the U.S. to reach agreements at Torquay with the Commonwealth countries other than Canada, had among other factors opened the question of whether North America, the sterling area and Western Europe really continued to share common objectives in their international economic policies. Consequently he suggested that a public reaffirmation of the principles that underlie the ITO and the GATT might be desirable. At the present time the GATT ties the three economic systems together and should be put on a continuing and more effective basis. The difficult question arose as to whether the September session was a propitious time to raise substantive issues of this kind.

5. It was clear from the ensuing discussions that careful consideration had to be given to the probable response of the U.K. to any steps which might be taken. Action, at this time, intended to strengthen the GATT might, in fact, have the opposite effect by precipitating a move to loosen basic provisions concerning preferences, quantative restrictions and non-discrimination. If the present uncertain political balance in the U.K. still existed during the next session, it would no doubt impose, at best, a negative role on the U.K. delegation.

6. Mr. Leddy expressed the view that arrangements for the continuing administration of the GATT could be made without opening up basic issues of a controversial nature.

7. Mr. N.A. Robertson, who was in the Chair, suggested toward the end of the meeting that, in the present circumstances, there was a real risk that a move for public reaffirmation of economic objectives might instead lead to repudiation; the present appeared to be a period for consolidation in which the important thing was to see that there was no backsliding.

Continuing Administration of the General Agreement

8. The objective here is to put the GATT on a firmer basis in the absence of an ITO. The U.S. have formulated a proposal that would have the effect of grafting the GATT Secretariat on to the U.N. Secretariat. To carry it out three steps are necessary: (1) agreement by the C.P. and a consequential recommendation to the ECOSOC; (2) a recommendation by ECOSOC to the General Assembly and, (3) approval of the proposed arrangement by the General Assembly. While the timetable would be tight, it may be possible to complete these steps in time for the arrangement to take effect early next year. Otherwise the present interim arrangements for financing the GATT would have to be carried over until next autumn.

9. Under this proposal the GATT budget would be paid out of U.N. funds. But it is intended that contracting parties who are not members of the U.N. would contribute their share. It is also intended that the GATT will continue to enjoy a high degree of autonomy.

10. It is thought that the GATT would be more secure under the umbrella of the United Nations than in the U.S. legislative mill; if the GATT were submitted to the U.S. Congress for definitive acceptance at this time it might meet substantial opposition. In spite of the obvious disadvantages and difficulties of an association of this sort the Canadian group was inclined to support the proposed arrangement as the best available alternative in the circumstances.

Quantitative Restrictions

11. Three possible alternatives with regard to the Review of Q.R. maintained for balance of payment reasons were discussed. The Report could consist: (a) of a purely factual presentation or, (b) it could, in addition, come to certain general conclusions about the justification for the continued maintenance of Q.R. or. (c) it could go a stage further and make detailed recommendations with respect to individual countries.

12. During the discussion of this subject Mr. Rasminsky expressed the view that the most effective assistance would be forthcoming from the I.M.F. if the C.P. established definite terms of reference for the association of the Fund in the Review. In this regard Mr. Deutsch suggested that there were the following alternatives; (a) the C.P. could tell the Fund what to do, (b) the Fund could, as in the past, participate with conclusions arrived at in advance of the Review by the C.P., (c) the Fund representative could participate in the Review, as it progressed, on a verbal basis. Mr. Deutsch favoured the latter approach. For institutional reasons, however, this arrangement might not be favoured by the Fund.

13. On the question of the Report which would emerge, while it might appear desirable to press for conclusions of a positive nature, it was suggested by the Canadian group that the question should be approached with caution. Given the composition and voting arrangements in the GATT there was a real danger that the "wrong" conclusions might emerge. It was difficult to secure conclusions unless they were specifically required by the GATT. It might, therefore, be better to wait for the March 1952 Review when justification for the continuation of discriminatory practices is required.

14. It was also suggested that the difficulty of reaching appropriate conclusions is complicated at present by defence programmes. Only tentative views on the matter were possible at this stage. The attitude to be adopted at the Sixth Session would have to depend to a large extent on the situation as it developed there. There might, however, be some advantage in advance consultations with the U.K. with a view to reaching agreement prior to the session on a conclusion similar to that contained in the second Report of the Fund on Exchange Restrictions. A general conclusion of the kind in that Report which does not refer to any particular country might be acceptable to the U.K.

New Zealand and Special Exchange Agreement

15. The U.S. side expressed the view that as there seems to be no prospect of N.Z. joining the Fund or entering into a Special Exchange Agreement this perennial question has become a "blind alley". It was suggested by the Canadian group that the best way out might be to obtain an undertaking by New Zealand at the next Session to the effect that New Zealand will conduct her exchange policies in such a way as not to frustrate the principles of the Fund at the GATT.

Restrictive Business Practices

16. The U.S. has placed this item on the agenda. With the lapse of the ITO, there is no U.N. activity in the field of monopoly, cartels and restrictive business practices generally. The U.S. resolution recommends to U.N. member governments the adoption of a general policy on restrictive business practices and the establishment of an ad hoc committee of the Council. This committee would be responsible for the drafting of a convention on restrictive business practices to be submitted directly to governments. It would also work out appropriate organizational arrangements within the U.N. for giving effect to the undertakings of the convention.

17. The recommendations contained in the U.S. resolution follow the wording of Article 46 (1) of Chapter 5 of the Havana Charter which was found acceptable by Canada at the Havana Conference.

18. It was indicated at the meeting that the Canadian Delegation would probably support the draft resolution. It was also agreed that this matter should be dealt with in the ECOSOC forum rather than by the GATT.

Schuman Plan Waiver

19. Because Schuman Plan countries will grant more favourable tariff treatment on coal and steel to each other than to other GATT countries a waiver of the MFN obligation in the GATT is required. It was considered important that the general incidence of the tariffs on coal and steel against the outside world should not be increased as a consequence of the Plan.

20. Mr. Plumptre said that the Canadian Government had indicated active support for a waiver specifically aimed at this particular operation. He suggested that it might be better to tie the waiver to the volume of goods moving instead of trying to devise some formula to measure the average incidence of tariffs. It was also suggested that the right to object about the operation of the Plan should not be forfeited in the waiver. In addition the point was made that the reasons for the waiver in the case of coal and steel should be spelled out in such a way as to prevent its use as a precedent for similar waivers for schemes in fields where they would not be justified.

Commodity Policy

21. Like the item Restrictive Business Practices this subject arises out of the lapse of the ITO. As recommended by ECOSOC the Secretary General has prepared a study on appropriate procedures to be adopted for convening study groups and international commodity conferences. It is understood that the U.N. Secretariat has prepared a draft resolution recommending that Governments follow a set of principles and procedures implementing the substance of Chapter 6 of the Havana Charter and other closely related articles of the Charter, and creating a permanent three man Commodity Coordinating Committee. Chapter 6 of the Havana Charter having been found acceptable to Canada it was indicated that we are prepared to give general support to the proposed action.

22. It was suggested in the course of the discussions that in the U.K. officials would favour having this subject considered in relation to GATT amendments. The U.S. and Canadian officials, however, agreed that it would be preferable to deal with Commodity agreements in the ECOSOC forum.

Czechoslovakia

23. The U.S. Administration had been directed in the RTAA to withdraw tariff concessions from Czechoslovakia. This raises the question of the interest of other countries in the concessions which are to be dropped. When China withdrew from the GATT, the U.S. retained the existing rates on items in which other countries had a substantial interest and dropped them on the remaining items.

24. Mr. Isbister expressed the view that other countries should not be placed in the position where they would have to make new concessions in order to retain the advantages they had gained under the Czechoslovakia-U.S. Agreement. Mr. Reisman pointed out that the China case is not parallel in that Czechoslovakia is not withdrawing from the GATT whereas China did. The Czechoslovak items are bound and it was possible that the C.P's. might not grant a waiver.

25. Mr. Leddy said it appeared advisable for the U.S. to seek a waiver before withdrawing the concessions from Czechoslovakia rather than take unilateral action in this matter.

Arrangements for Tariff Negotiations under the GATT

26. The U.S. is intending to seek agreement at the Sixth Session on arrangements, in the absence of new general tariff conferences under the GATT, to allow the undertaking and conclusion within the GATT framework of tariff negotiations (a) between existing contracting parties and non GATT countries for the accession of the latter to the GATT and (b) among existing contracting parties for the further reduction of tariff barriers among them.

27. The role of the proposed Standing Committee in connection with such arrangements was discussed — particularly with reference to securing an advance indication of whether the accession of a new country was likely to secure the necessary approval by 2/3 of the C.P's.

28. It was agreed that consideration should be given to arrangements for the tariff negotiations in the absence of general conferences such as had been held at Geneva, Annecy and Torquay.

Problem of Disparities in the Level of European Tariffs

29. The low tariff countries in Europe are pressing for action on this problem which arises primarily out of the inadequate operation of the principle that the binding of a low tariff constitutes a quid pro quo for the reduction of a high one. The inter-sessional study of the problem arranged at Torquay has apparently not progressed very far.

30. It was agreed that a non-discriminatory solution to the problem should be sought. In this connection it was pointed out that payment for such a solution might well include further tariff concessions by the U.S. and Canada.

Amendments to the GATT

31. It was generally agreed that the introduction at the next session of the contentious question of substantive amendments to the GATT should be avoided. In this general connection Mr. Plumptre said that Mr. Wilgress was of the view that the GATT should be preserved as the international instrument in the field of commercial policy and that its usefulness and effectiveness would be undermined by the addition of other responsibilities which could better be dealt with by other international bodies.

RTAA

32. Mr. Leddy expressed the view that the only real setback in the new RTAA was in relation to agriculture. Prior to 1947, Section 22 of the AAA made provisions for fees quotas etc., when agricultural imports prejudice the operation of domestic agricultural price-support programmes. After GATT was entered into, the Administration had succeeded in getting Congress to alter Section 22 in such a way as to establish that the obligations under GATT took precedence. That provision had now been removed and the position reverted to that of 1947. Notwithstanding this setback the Administration felt that the RTAA was workable and that it might be possible to administer the revised Section 22 in such a way as not to conflict with GATT obligations.

SIXTH SESSION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES TO THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Mr. John M. Leddy of the United States State Department returned to Ottawa on August 16 to discuss with Canadian officials the results of the talks which he had with the British, French, Belgians, Dutch and Norwegians regarding the principal issues which are likely to be raised at the forthcoming session of the Contracting Parties. The following is a brief outline of the main points which emerged from our discussions with Leddy.

Restrictive Business Practices

2. Leddy reported that the United Kingdom had been the only country thus far to oppose the United States proposal to have this subject discussed at the current session of the Economic and Social Council. United Kingdom officials considered that restrictive business practices were closely related to the broader aspects of commercial policy and ought, therefore, to be dealt with under the GATT rather than by ECOSOC. Apart from these formal considerations, the United Kingdom position was that action in this field should only be taken in conjunction with amendments to the GATT in its present form by having ECOSOC assume responsibility for the implementation of individual articles of the Havana Charter was not acceptable to the United Kingdom. Finally, it was suggested that the United Kingdom authorities would find it politically difficult to deal with the cartel question at this juncture and that they would much prefer to avoid taking action for the time being.

3. Leddy made it clear, however, that the United States proposal did not envisage anything in the nature of concrete or definitive action at this time, but merely called for the setting up of a working party by ECOSOC to consider the implications of this question and to recommend action which might appropriately be taken by intergovernmental agreement. Inasmuch as Canada had taken an active part in the framing of Article 5 of the Havana Charter and was therefore, in a sense, committed to the principles embodied in it, he hoped that Canada would find it possible to support the United States proposal in the Economic and Social Council. In the absence of Canadian support, he suggested, it might be difficult to enlist the support of the Western Europeans who were chronically reluctant to take measures against cartels.

4. We told Leddy that the feeling of Canadian officials seemed generally sympathetic to the United States proposal. However, when Cabinet approved the General Instructions to the Canadian Delegation to ECOSOC, it had done so subject to the condition that any specific proposal relating to a conference or convention on restrictive business practices should be referred to Ottawa for direction. The Canadian Delegation had accordingly been instructed to refrain from actively supporting the principle of the assumption by ECOSOC of responsibility for initiating international action in this field, and to keep Ottawa fully informed of any relevant proposals which might be submitted to the Council. Now that the United States proposal had been informally circulated at Geneva, it would be referred to Ministers.

Basic Amendments to the GATT

5. It now appears that the United Kingdom will not propose any substantive amendments to the GATT at the coming session of the Contracting Parties. The United Kingdom authorities are prepared to see the GATT applied in its present form as long as it is understood that the Agreement will continue to be regarded as no more than provisional. As for the French and Belgians, they expressed the view that no basic amendments were, in fact, required and that they would be ready to accept the GATT definitively in its present form.

6. The Norwegians, on the other hand, are evidently determined to press for the inclusion of Articles 3, 4 and 6 of the Havana Charter, or something like them, at the forthcoming Geneva session. In this connection Leddy pointed out that Article 3, dealing with full employment, had no significance for anyone as long as the GATT was merely on a provisional basis. This could, of course, not be said for Articles 4 and 6 which might be considered on their merits. He thought that, partly for domestic political reasons, the Norwegians would go ahead with the inclusion of their proposed amendments in the agenda of the Sixth Session, though he was unable to say how far they were prepared to press their case.

Continuing Administration of the GATT

7. With the exception of the French none of the European countries appeared to welcome the United States suggestion that responsibility for the financing of the GATT Secretariat be transferred to the United Nations. United Kingdom officials feared that this would lead to undue interference by ECOSOC in the activities of the Contracting Parties, and this fear was shared by the Belgians and the Dutch. The United Kingdom and Norway also thought that the integration of the GATT Secretariat in the framework of the United Nations carried with it an implication of permanence which they were not prepared to endorse.

8. In reply to these objections, Leddy pointed out that the Contracting Parties would, in any case, spell out their autonomy in addressing their recommendations to ECOSOC. Integration in the United Nations should entail no more than the submission of an annual report to ECOSOC. This report would of course be debated in the Council but such a debate could not have been avoided even if the I.T.O. had been set up. Leddy saw no alternative to the United States proposal since the Administration in Washington is more than reluctant to submit the GATT to Congress. He hoped that United Kingdom support might, in the end, be forthcoming for the integration proposal, if only as a pis aller.

Arrangements for Tariff Negotiations under the GATT

9. All of the countries consulted appeared to be agreeable to the setting up of some mechanism for the initiation of negotiations between the regular sessions of the Contracting Parties. The relevant United States proposal was, however, regarded as too general in nature and Leddy intimated that a revised paper would shortly be circulated by the United States.

10. As you will recall, the United States proposal regarding the procedure to be adopted for intercessional tariff negotiations were based, in part at least, on the assumption that there would be no objection to the creation of a Standing Committee which could function as a central co-ordinating body. It was felt that the existence of such a Committee would shorten the regular sessions even if it did not reduce their number, and by shortening the sessions would probably ensure high-level representation on the part of the Contracting Parties. At the same time, it was clearly realized that the present mood of the Contracting Parties would not favour the shifting of substantive issues to a Standing Committee and that, if such a Committee were created, its terms of reference would have to be rigidly delimited.

11. Leddy told us that the United Kingdom was the only country which had raised objections to the creation of a Standing Committee, mainly on the grounds that such a step would imply the permanence of the GATT. He suggested, however, that United Kingdom agreement could probably be secured if some more innocuous name were adopted for the Committee, and if it were made clear that the Committee would function only between one session and the next. It was generally agreed that, as long as the GATT remained provisional, the headquarters of the Committee should be at Geneva; it had positive advantages and alternative sites raised too many problems.

Quantitative Restrictions

12. The consensus of opinion among the countries consulted was that the Executive Secretary of the GATT should draw up, in consultation with the International Monetary Fund, a single report covering both the review of restrictions provided for under Article XII-4(b) and the second report on discrimination under Article XIV-1(g). This report would be submitted without conclusions, and the Contracting Parties would then work out general conclusions as a result of their review in which the Fund representative would participate on the same basis as national representatives. The Fund representative would be free to agree or disagree with the conclusions reached, but it was considered unsatisfactory for the Fund to submit a separate report with conclusions which had been formulated prior to the review and thus rendered the position of the Fund representative unnecessarily inflexible.

13. The United Kingdom had no jurisdictional objections to a general review with general conclusions, and Leddy indicated that the United States was inclined to agree with this procedure. The Contracting Parties would, in any case, have to produce justification for continued deviations from the rules of non-discrimination in March 1952.

14. There was evidently no disposition on the part of any of the countries visited by Leddy to support the Australian proposal to settle relations between the GATT and the Fund definitively and in great detail at this session. It would appear, moreover, that the Australian themselves are prepared not to press for action at the present juncture.

Schuman Plan Waiver

15. Inasmuch as there appeared to be little likelihood of the Plan's being ratified before the end of the year, the question of a waiver would probably not come up at the forthcoming session of the Contracting Parties. Leddy thought that the formulation of an appropriate waiver might be one of the subjects which the proposed Standing Committee could be asked to consider.

16. As a result of his conversations with some of the Western Europeans Leddy had gathered the impression that there might be some pressure to have the waiver drafted in such a form that it could be regarded as creating a precedent rather than as a unique document to apply to a very special intergovernmental arrangement. We agreed with Leddy that this ought to be avoided and that the Schuman Plan waiver should not be regarded as automatically paving the way for future intra-European arrangements of a similar nature.

Czechoslovakia

17. Leddy outlined the dilemma in which the United States had found itself in connection with this issue. If the United States Government had decided to confront the Contracting Parties with a fait accompli be abrogating its present obligations toward Czechoslovakia before obtaining a waiver, such action on the part of the United States would obviously have created an undesirable precedent. At the same time, however, in taking such a step the United States would have assumed the entire responsibility without involving other Contracting Parties in what will no doubt be a delicate decision. Furthermore, if the United States request for a waiver were rejected at the Sixth Session of the GATT, Washington would be compelled to renounce its obligations unilaterally in contravention of a decision by the Contracting Parties, and this would probably be more detrimental to the prestige of the GATT than if such action had been taken without prior consultation with the Contracting Parties.

18. As for the basis on which the United States might seek a waiver of its obligations toward Czechoslovakia, United Kingdom officials felt that the waiver should be in such general terms that other countries could subsequently avail themselves of it, if they so wished (Leddy was not able to give reasons for the United Kingdom position). The reaction among the continental Western Europeans, on the other hand, was precisely the opposite. These countries are anxious not to have political issues brought into the GATT and would be most reluctant to be put in a position where they might have to pronounce themselves on the more general questions of East-West trade or the implications of the political tension between the Soviet bloc and the countries of the free world for the continuation of normal economic relations.

19. We told Leddy that it would probably also be much easier for Canada to support a waiver on a purely bilateral basis in which other countries would not be directly implicated. Ministers might well agree, on the basis of newspaper reports, that the United States had a good case in its complaint against Czechoslovakia. They would probably not, on the other hand, wish Canada to be involved in the waiver, since we had no spectacular commercial grievances against Czechoslovakia ourselves, and would be reluctant to have the GATT step out of the commercial sphere.

20. We gathered that the United States has no wish to put other countries in a difficult political position and that there is no disposition in Washington to take any action designed to drive the Czechs out of the GATT. It would, of course, be virtually impossible in any case to secure Western European support for the waiver on such a basis.

21. It is our impression that, under the proposed waiver, the United States will seek the severance of all its contractual obligations toward Czechoslovakia under the GATT, including, of course, tariff concessions originally negotiated by the United States with Czechoslovakia. In order, however, to minimize the effects of the waiver upon the multilateral structure of the GATT, we understand that the authorities in Washington are planning to maintain these tariff concessions in respect of all other Contracting Parties which are affected by them.

22. Incidentally, Leddy added that United States representatives at Geneva will make it clear that the fur-felt-hat complaint will be regarded as continuing because of its interest to other Contracting Parties. The United States is anxious to avoid creating the impression that the waiver is being used as a means of shelving an obviously embarrassing complaint.

Problem of Disparities in the Level of European Tariffs

23. No final report has yet been submitted by the inter-sessional working party which was set up at Torquay to consider this problem. The Dutch, however, have put forward a proposal involving a comprehensive list of all items of intra-European trade in which there is any disparity. Under their proposal the disparity between the highest and lowest European tariff would be calculated and provision made for its reduction on a percentage basis over a number of year.

24. Leddy told us that the Benelux and Scandinavian countries are planning to meet on August 20 to discuss the Dutch proposal. If they reach a substantial measure of agreement, it will then be necessary for them to sell the proposal to the reluctant French who have already advanced a series of counter-proposals. As for the United Kingdom, it would probably not agree to any automatic formula as envisaged in the Dutch proposal. The United Kingdom would prefer to have the reductions initially confined to the Continent and to compensate at a later stage on a selective basis.

United States Quotas and Embargoes on Agricultural Imports ("Andresen Amendment")

25. We discussed in some detail the United States House of Representatives amendment to Title 1 of the Defence Production Act of 1950 which not only contravenes the obligations assumed by the United States under the GATT but, with specific reference to Canada, would have the practical effect of reducing the value of an existing concession by cutting substantially our exports of cheese and processed milks to the United States.

26. We indicated to Leddy that, during the last session of the Canadian Parliament, Members had insistently questioned officials in Committee in regard to the permanence of the concessions extended to Canada by the United States at Torquay. In response to these questions officials had gone a long way towards assuring Members that it would be almost inconceivable for the United States to nullify or impair these concessions and (in reply to further questions) that, in the unlikely event of such nullification or impairment, executive action only would be required for retaliatory measures and it would not be necessary to call a special session of Parliament.

27. Quite apart, however, from the specific question at issue, Congressional endorsement of the import control amendment would tend to reinforce the impression that anything we negotiate with the United States cannot, in the final analysis, be regarded as firm and that what happened to us in respect of cheese exports today might happen to us at any time in respect of other products in which Canadian exporters have a substantial interest.

28. Leddy admitted that the import control amendment represented a clear departure even from the provisional application of the GATT. It was his understanding that the Office of Defence Mobilization had under consideration a modification of the Defence Production Act during the present session of Congress. The view was expressed that a strong formal representation by the Canadian Government, in a form in which it could be made public, might be most influential if the Administration reopened the issue with Congress.

29. In general, it was felt that any action taken by the United States in this connection should be designed to restore the original concession rather than to compensate for this departure from the principles embodied in the GATT.

SIXTH SESSION OF THE CONTRACTING PARTIES TO THE GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

Delegation

It is recommended that the Canadian Delegation to the forthcoming session of the Contracting Parties to the GATT, which opens at Geneva on September 17, be composed as follows:

Chairman
C.M. Isbister, Department of Trade and Commerce

Parliamentary Adviser
James Sinclair, M.P., Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance

Delegates
L. Couillard, Department of External Affairs
W.J. Callaghan, Department of Finance
S. Reisman, Department of Finance
M. Schwarzmann, Department of Trade and Commerce

Secretary
K. Goldschlag, Department of External Affairs

General Instructions

2. In view of the successful tariff negotiations under the GATT by which tariffs accounting for a large proportion of the world's trade have been reduced and bound against subsequent increase, the Delegation is instructed, in general, to support measures which will strengthen the GATT and add prestige and continuity to its functions. On the other hand, it should oppose measures which, by expanding the scope of the existing activities of the Contracting Parties, might diversify their objectives and possibly diminish their effectiveness in the field of tariffs and trade.

3. At the coming session consideration will be given to proposals for establishing some form of inter-sessional organization to render the regular sessions of the Contracting Parties more fruitful and less protracted with a view to ensuring a high level of representation at such sessions. The Delegation should continue to sponsor proposals aimed at improving in this way the effectiveness of the administration of the General Agreement.

4. As a result of the continued deterioration of commercial relations between the United States and Czechoslovakia, and recent legislation in the United States which requires the withdrawal of tariff concessions from countries under Soviet domination, the United States has given notice that it will seek from the Contracting Parties a waiver of its obligations toward Czechoslovakia.

5. It is understood that this waiver will be sought, not on broad political grounds, which would provoke unnecessary political debate and controversy, but on the grounds that the Czechs have already defaulted in their general obligations under the GATT towards the United States by their persecution and intimidation of persons trading with the United States and by their unwillingness to allow Americans to visit and trade freely in their country.

6. It is further understood that the proposed United States action will be designed to avoid injury to the interests of other Contracting Parties and, furthermore, that the United States will not request other Contracting Parties to follow her lead in withdrawing tariff concessions from Czechoslovakia. On this understanding the Delegation should support the waiver of obligations requested by the United States.

7. Now that the United States has indicated that it will not ratify the Havana Charter for an International Trade Organization, the GATT remains the only multilateral instrument under which negotiations can be arranged to deal with tariffs and related questions. In the consideration which is to be given to the continuing administration of the General Agreement, the Delegation should, therefore, support measures designed to ensure the stability of the GATT organization and the provision of the necessary financial support.[26]

I. G.A.T.T.; REPORT ON GENEVA MEETING

1. Mr. Isbister said that consideration of the Geneva meeting of the parties to GATT afforded an appropriate opportunity to examine the position of GATT at this stage.

It was apparent that events since 1947 had not enabled fulfilment of the expectations when the General Agreement was signed. It had been thought then that import restrictions would gradually be eliminated. Instead there were at present 23 countries with such restrictions for balance of payments reasons. Balance of payments difficulties had been the normal instead of the exception since 1947. Notwithstanding this discrepancy between present conditions and those for which GATT was designed, the Geneva meeting indicated a surprising vitality and interest in the organization. A statement by Mr. Shawcross had been interpreted as notice of U.K. intention to withdraw from GATT, but it had been misinterpreted. What he had done was to point out that GATT had been intended as a transitional compromise to apply until the International Trade Organization was established. With I.T.O. dead, the status of GATT was altered and the U.K. wished to make it clear that they were not satisfied with its present provisions and were looking toward the review that was provided for by Article XXIX. The major reason for U.K. dissatisfaction was the lack of adequate elbow room for British preferences. Their emphasis on the importance of a general renegotiation led them at the present time to discourage proposals for interim adjustments and partial changes.

Almost all major countries expressed some dissatisfaction with GATT. Usually it was directed at one or the other of the opposite sides of the same point. Soft currency countries complained that the United States was a high tariff country and that under GATT it had no need to scale down its tariffs and was under no compulsion to carry out its real obligations as a creditor country. On the other hand, they claimed they had to justify any quantitative restrictions they found they had to impose. The Agreement was balanced against them. On the other side, the hard currency countries usually took the position that under GATT they had reduced their tariffs and opened their markets but that they could get no real compensation because quantitative restrictions kept them out of the soft currency markets. In the face of such complaints, it seemed rash to predict that any renegotiation under Article XXIX would produce a balance very different from that now provided in GATT.

At the Geneva meeting, the Canadian delegation found itself with grievances against the three principal Canadian customers — the United Kingdom, the United States[27] and Belgium.[28] In the case of the United Kingdom, the problem was the adaptation of their utility programme to meet complaints about adverse treatment of imported items. There was some debate but the United Kingdom indicated it was not yet in a position to correct the situation.

The problem with the U.S. was that of the restrictions on dairy products. Canada and eight other countries all said that they were contrary to GATT and had caused injury. At the end of the meeting, as Congressional action in the United States was still incomplete, the problem had been to decide what action should be taken. It was desired to have recognition that retaliatory steps would be justified but it was felt undesirable to give specific authorization for them unless some countries were prepared to act. Moreover, it was felt that it would be more helpful to the U.S. administration in securing Congressional action if there was a threat of retaliation in the background rather than specific measures of retaliation actually in effect. A threat could appear to menace several different points and thus would give concern to a number of U.S. interests. Actual retaliation would have specific and more limited effect. The result was a resolution that took note of the complaints; recognized that the concessions granted by the United States had been nullified or impaired within the meaning of Article XXIII and that the restrictions were an infringement of Article XI; noted that the U.S. governments was taking action for repeal; and counselled governments, without prejudice to their rights, to give the United States a reasonable period to rectify the situation.

Copies of the resolution had been circulated.

LA CONFÉRENCE DE BRUXELLES SUR LES MIGRATIONS, 26 NOVEMBRE-4 DÉCEMBRE 1951
BRUSSELS CONFERENCE ON MIGRATION, NOVEMBER 26-DECEMBER 4, 1951

BRUSSELS CONFERENCE ON MIGRATION; INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION[29]

1. The International Refugee Organization is expected to wind up its operations on December 31, 1951. Unless arrangements are made to the contrary, the twelve converted ships which have been used by IRO for the transport of migrants will be returned to their owners and will likely be lost for international migration purposes. The United States State Department has circulated a draft plan for an interim operating agency to facilitate the migration of surplus populations from countries of Western Europe and Greece to countries affording re-settlement opportunities overseas. The Belgium government has issued invitations to interested countries to attend a conference in Brussels, commencing on November 26, at which the United States plan will be discussed.[30]

2. The main purpose of the United States plan, which is intended to be on an ad hoc basis and renewable from year to year, is to provide a means whereby available IRO facilities, particularly the ships, can continue to be used for moving emigrants from Europe. The proposed facilities include location, selection, documentation, movement, reception, transportation and medical assistance services for migrants, including new arrivals from Eastern Europe. However, these proposed ancillary facilities, over and above transportation, will be subject to negotiation and agreement at the Brussels conference. The potential movement objective for one year of operations is assumed to be approximately 115,000 migrants and refugees with origins and destinations tentatively established as follows:

[30] Le chef de la délégation était C.E.S. Smith, le directeur de l'Immigration.
The Canadian delegation was led by C.E.S. Smith, Director of Immigration.

FROM		TO
Germany	55,000	Canada	40,000
Italy and Trieste	35,000	United States	25,000
Austria	15,000	Australia	25,000
Netherlands	6,000	Latin America	23,000
Greece, Portugal	4,000	New Zealand	2,000
Total	115,000	Total	115,000

3. It is estimated that the movement of approximately 115,000 migrants and refugees during a year of operations, following generally the distribution given above, could be accomplished at an over-all cost of approximately $34 million. A general break-down of this overall budget envisaged by the plan shows:

Administration		$ 3,060,300
Operations
Shipping	$19,765,000
Processing, etc.	11,118,700	30,883,700
Total		$ 33,944,000

The United States had a $10 million congressional appropriation to get the plan under way, over and above the contributions they would make to the Organization as reimbursements for actual services rendered in the movement of the U.S. quota of 25,000 migrants for the first year's operations. Out of this $10 million, the United States propose to contribute $1 million towards administration costs and $9 million towards a proposed Operating Fund of from $12 to $14 million. Other participating countries would contribute towards the Administrative Budget and the Operating Fund on a basis to be negotiated at Brussels. The Operating Fund would finance operations pending reimbursement by member governments for services rendered, and also provide subsidies to special migration projects and to the movement of refugees from iron-curtain countries.

4. The Interdepartmental Advisory Committee on Immigration, after considering the various implications of the plan, felt that the scheme generally would be of benefit to Canada since it would allow the continuance in operation for European migration purposes of the twelve ships now operated by IRO and would further permit good use to be made of the $10 million appropriation which has been specifically earmarked by Congress for migration scheme on an international basis. On the other hand, the Committee felt that the proposal put forward by the U.S. State Department was perhaps conceived on too elaborate a scale and that in its present form it provided for ancillary services which would duplicate existing Canadian services.

5. In view of the above and keeping in mind present and prospective Canadian immigration requirements, the Interdepartmental Committee recommends:

(a) that Canada participate in the forthcoming Brussels Conference on Immigration;

(b) that the Canadian delegation make it clear that, in any circumstances and regardless of the nature of the organization, Canada will retain complete control in respect of selection standards and numbers of immigrants;

(c) that Canada would probably wish to use only the embarkation and shipping facilities of the organization and that Canada would not be prepared to have included in the project additional services and facilities unless there is clear evidence that such services are essential to the success of a practical scheme;

(d) that the delegation make every effort to obtain a substantial reduction in the administrative budget by the adoption of more economical policies, particularly in respect of personnel and salaries — (the delegation should aim at a reduction of 50% or more);

(e) that the delegation should urge that, in assessing the administrative budget of the organization, full account be taken of the contributions member governments are already making toward the solution of the European migration problem;

(f) that Canada should be prepared to make an advance contribution to the Operating Fund in order to help get the plan under way. This advance payment would be drawn upon as required to pay on a cost basis for services rendered by the organization to Canada, on the understanding that the Canadian government would recover all or part of such expenditures from the immigrants after landing. In addition, Canada should agree to make a reasonable non-recoverable contribution to the Operating Fund for practical measures to facilitate the emigration of refugees from Eastern Europe, provided that other countries make a proportionate contribution; and

(g) that the delegation be authorized to commit Canada in principle to joining the proposed organization, provided that the principles set above were met.

6. The Committee wish to point out, with reference to the recommendations outlined above, that the refugee problem, which is included in the proposed scheme, is one that can hardly be treated in the same manner as the normal Western European immigration movements that are to be carried out under the plan. Insofar as the movement of nationals from Western European countries is concerned, the new scheme will, in essence, be an extension on an international plane of the revolving fund principle now in operation in Canada on a national basis. It should therefore be possible to recover from the immigrants, once they have landed in Canada, a good portion if not all of the monies expended on their behalf out of Canada's contribution to the international Operating Fund. In respect of refugees, the amounts recoverable will be substantially smaller and in many cases recovery may be impossible. It is for this reason that, in paragraph (f) above, it is suggested that a special Canadian contribution to the Operating Fund should be earmarked for the movement of refugees. The exact amount of this special refugee credit should be determined in advance to ensure that Canada is not committed to a liability disproportionately greater than that which other countries are willing to assume on this score. The Committee suggests, for the delegation's guidance, that Canada's initial recoverable contribution to the Fund might be $500,000 subject to review and renewal when exhausted. It should be made clear, however, that the Canadian contribution to the Fund in respect of refugees for one year's operations should not be more than is required to move a pre-determined percentage of Canada's total quota which has tentatively been fixed at 40,000. Based on this year's total intake of immigrants, including refugees, into Canada, an acceptable percentage might be 8, 10 or 12% depending on what other receiving countries are prepared to do in this respect.

7. The Committee also felt that the present draft of the U.S. plan stressed unduly the fact that the scheme was designed to relief the "surplus population" problem in Western European countries. The Canadian delegation to the Brussels conference might usefully be instructed to underplay the "surplus population" theme and to suggest that the U.S. proposal is primarily designed to salvage IRO shipping facilities for the purpose of continuing and concluding, on an ad hoc and somewhat expanded basis, the resettlement job necessitated by the last war. An international migration scheme based on premises of this character would be much more acceptable to Canada and, no doubt, to many other participating countries.

8. The Committee recommends that instructions based on the above recommendations, if approved, be forwarded immediately to the Canadian delegation to the Brussels conference on migration.[31]

MIGRATION CONFERENCE

Following from Smith, Begins.

1. Following general debate in which most speakers approved the main features of the United States proposal it was agreed (largely due to Canadian insistence in private conversations with Warren) that resolution agreeing to constitute the Migration Committee would only be considered after some detailed discussion.

2. Subsequently a committee on shipping was set up in which Canada took the lead in urging that commercial shipping is insufficient to handle our requirements.

[31] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 22 novembre 1951./Approved by Cabinet, November 22, 1951.

Committee will, therefore, report to Conference that ships additional to commercial ships are required.

3. Conference has had general debate on administrative budget and Canada, Italy, Germany, Australia, Netherlands and Greece called for substantial reductions. Emigration countries said embarkation staff and processing staff will be unnecessary. Canada took the lead in insisting on number of international staff and salary levels be reduced. Subcommittee consisting of the United States, Italy, Germany and Canada was appointed to revise estimates appearing in appendice B1 to United States proposal.

4. In the revised administrative budget approved by the sub-committee, provisions for embarkation and processing staff have been deleted and as a result the number of liaison officers increased. Number of international staff has been reduced from 154 to 114 and costs, including reserves, reduced from 1,509,400 to 866,400. Local staff has been reduced from 186 to 178, though total cost increased slightly. Reductions result in total of 2,459,060 instead of 3,060,300.

5. Warren was not, repeat not, helpful in obtaining reductions, although he invoked as argument only generalizations about necessity of having adequate competent staff to do the job. Although he eventually agreed to revised figures it was apparent that despite effort of other members of subcommittee further reductions could not, repeat not, be obtained.

6. Revised administrative budget was approved unanimously by the conference without vote, subject to the subsequent approval by Migration Committee when established, and on clear understanding that governments are not, repeat not, in any way committed by this conference decision.

7. Governments expected to participate in the organization are now attempting to devise basis for contributions to administrative budget. When agreement is reached on this matter, resolution referred to in paragraph 8 of my telegram No. 168 will be submitted to conference. It is possible the resolution will be put to vote at meeting today, December 1st.

8. Canada and Australia have proposed to the United States amendments to resolution deleting references to surplus population. It is also understood United States will agree to include in resolution a statement that any country voting for resolution does so subject to later confirmation by government of that country after constitutional processes have been completed.

9. As detailed discussion at recent meetings has enabled Canadian delegation to make clear points set out in paragraph (b) and (c) of our instructions (your telegram No. 148 of November 23rd)† and as we have made efforts requested in paragraph (d), although with less success than we had hoped for, I believe, I am now, justified under paragraph (g) in voting for resolution, provided that preliminary decisions with regard to assessments for administering budget are satisfactory.

Following for the Head of the Canadian Delegation to the Brussels Migration Conference, Begins: Reference your No. 170 of December 1.

1. We believe that a vote on Monday on the resolution would be premature. The Canadian Delegation should seek a deferment on such a vote until there has been adequate opportunity for a full discussion. Please inform U.S. and other friendly delegations that if resolution is put to a vote on Monday, you will have to abstain but that if vote is postponed to Wednesday or Thursday and action is taken by conference along lines set out in paragraphs 3 and 4 below, you expect to be able to vote in favour of the resolution.

2. We shall submit matter to Cabinet on Tuesday. Please send us Monday night latest information available.

3. In particular we wish to emphasize the following points: We wish to confirm our message No. 155 of November 30th.† We believe very strongly that it is essential that at least the main principles and some of the more important details should be agreed to by the Conference before the Provisional Committee is set up.

4. Agreement on the following is required:

(a) Canada will retain complete control in respect of selection, standards and number of immigrants.

(b) A further reduction in the administrative budget. While the revised budget is a step in the right direction it does not go far enough. For example the salaries of the international staff still average over seven thousand [dollars] and seem unduly high. Moreover there has been no reduction in administrative costs and motor transport to parallel the reduction in the number of international staff.

(c) That the Canadian contribution to the Operating Fund should be considered as advance payment for services to be rendered to Canada except for that portion agreed to by Canada which is to be used for the movement of Eastern European Refugees.

(d) Assessments to the administrative budget. We note that preliminary discussions on the basis for contributions have been held. We hope that Canadian assessment will take into consideration para. 2(e) of your instructions.

5. We are asking our Embassy in Washington to take up with the State Department urgently, and on a high level, the question of further substantial reductions in the administrative budget. The refusal of Warren to agree to cut off more than 20 per cent seems to us to indicate that the U.S. is not willing to resist efforts by the I.R.O. officials to load the Organization with [illegible] cost I.R.O. deadwood. We are also asking our Missions in Italy, Germany, Australia, the Netherlands, United Kingdom and Greece, to enlist the sympathetic support of their Governments in our further efforts in this direction. This is a further reason why the vote should be postponed; therefore you may wish to take up these points with these delegations at Brussels.

TELEGRAM 171 Brussels, December 2, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL. IMMEDIATE.

Repeat Candel Paris No. 103; London No. 2158.
Reference: Your telegrams No. 157 of December 1st.
Following from Head of Delegation, Migration Conference.

1. Your paragraph 1 and paragraph 2. It would be embarrassing for the Canadian delegation to seek deferment of the vote on the resolution. Discussion of the resolution will begin Monday, December 3rd, and it is possible that the discussion will be completed by Monday evening, although submission of numerous amendments may delay completion of discussion until Tuesday. We shall wire latest information Monday evening but sincerely hope permission may be granted to vote for the resolution without awaiting Cabinet meeting in view of the information below.

2. Your paragraph 4(a). It has repeatedly been made clear that each country will retain complete control of selection standards and the numbers of immigrants.

3. Your paragraph 4(b). We agree that the administrative budget has not been sufficiently reduced but it has been made clear that the total of 2,459,060 is merely a ceiling sufficiently high to ensure competent administration. Once the resolution has been approved those countries voting for the resolution will meet and examine the budget in detail. At that time each post, each salary and every other item will have to be justified before acceptance. It is hoped that Pollock will be able to attend those meetings and we are getting in touch with him. Other responsible delegations share our views that budget has not yet been sufficiently reduced but they have agreed that discussion in further details will be more effective when only interested countries participate, i.e., after resolution is voted and general conference is formally ended.

4. Average salary for international staff is now 5,600, not, repeat not, over 7,000 as you suggest. You have included staff reserves, the amount for which has been reduced from 400,000 to 228,000, i.e., from 2,597 per person to 2,000 per person. Administrative costs for headquarters have been reduced from 590,000 to 360,000 and conference costs from 100,000 to 90,000. Administrative costs for liaison offices increased from 175,000 to 350,000 to take account of additional duties in view of deletion of processing and embarkation of staff but it was emphasized that this figure would be examined very carefully before Provisional Committee adopts budget. Contingency reserve increased from 150,000 to 250,000 pending later study.

5. Your paragraph 4(c). This has been agreed to.

6. Your paragraph 4(d). It has been agreed provisionally that the administrative budget should be allocated as follows:

Three ninths to the United States;

Two ninths to emigration countries;

Two ninths to immigration countries;

Two ninths to interested countries such as France, Belgium and Switzerland.

Allocation to countries within these groups will not be made until those countries voting for the resolution meet following the close of the General Conference and again I hope Pollock will be able to take part in the meetings when allocations are discussed further.

7. As other countries are now prepared to deal with the resolution; as principles outlined November 26th, paragraph 4, have been met in the manner described above; as it has been made abundantly clear that countries voting for the resolution will then have an opportunity to examine the whole project and budget in further detail and make appropriate revisions; as Canadian delegation might not, repeat not, be able to participate in the subsequent meetings and would certainly not be able to vote in such meetings if we abstained on the resolution; as Canada would benefit from the use of shipping services under the new organization; and as it does not appear possible, after consultation with other delegations to prolong the formal conference after the discussion on the resolution to begin Monday, it is hoped further instructions may be forwarded by immediate telegram authorizing me to vote in favour.

8. With regard to the text of the resolution, amendment suggested in paragraph 7 of your telegram No. 155 of November 30th† would not, repeat not, be appropriate as there will be no Final Act of Conference apart from the resolution. In my view, words "in principle" included in your amendment are covered by an additional paragraph 3 of the operative part which reads "in accordance with the required governmental processes."

MIGRATION CONFERENCE

Following from Head of Delegation, Migration Conference, Begins: Due to atmospheric conditions telephone calls not possible.

2. Because our private request that some delay be afforded it was agreed to set up drafting group to consider the resolution. Drafting group consisting of the United States, United Kingdom, France, Italy, Germany, the Netherlands, Brazil and Canada met all afternoon of December 3 and will meet Tuesday morning, December 4. If the drafting group completes work in morning and its report considered satisfactory, resolution will be put to vote in afternoon.

3. We are attempting to have resolution amended to include terms of reference for new organization and general principles under which it will operate. We shall try to include all points contained in our instructions. We are also trying to have paragraph 3 of the operative part changed to read "that membership in the committee shall be open to governments with a demonstrated interest in principles of the free movement of persons and which undertake, subject to approval by proper constitutional authorities, to make a financial contribution to the Committee, the amount of which will be agreed to by governments concerned." These amendments have not, repeat not, yet been reached by drafting group.

4. Thirteen countries are apparently prepared to vote for the resolution now and will then constitute provisional committee to review proposed operations, budget and allocations in detail. Our fear is that if we abstain on resolution we will not, repeat not, be able to take part in subsequent discussions. We would, therefore, appreciate further instructions to reach us by Tuesday afternoon, Brussels time. Ends.

BRUSSELS MIGRATION CONFERENCE

Matthews and LePan saw Hickerson at the State Department this morning to urge that the United States delegation at the Brussels Conference be instructed to agree to a further substantial reduction in the proposed administrative budget.

2. Matthews pointed out that, since it was possible that the organization which was now being planned would continue in existence for some years, it was important that it should be on sound and modest lines. Once the organization had been created, it would be difficult almost to the point of impossibility to pare its administrative budget. In spite of the reductions which had been agreed to in Brussels, the proposed administrative budget still seemed to officials in Ottawa to be greatly overinflated. The number of officials which it was proposed to employ and the scale of salaries which they were to receive both seemed too lavish. Moreover, it would seem that reductions in administrative costs could be made to parallel the reduction in the number of international staff. The Canadian authorities also questioned the need for expensive liaison missions in receiving countries. There would seem to be no necessity for such a mission in Canada, for example. Unless the proposed administrative budget could be further reduced, the Canadian Government might not be able to participate in the proposed scheme.

3. Hickerson said that he would despatch a message to Warren at once bringing these views to his attention. He also said that they would be considered without delay in the State Department. It was apparent that some of the possible ways of saving money which were suggested in your telegram No. 2312† of the 2nd of December had not hitherto been carefully examined by the United States officials who have been dealing with this matter.

4. Hickerson made no promise that instructions would be issued to Warren to accept a further reduction in the administrative budget. But he was very sympathetic to the points we made and whatever message he sends to Warren is likely to assist in the softening-up process.

BRUSSELS CONFERENCE ON MIGRATION; INSTRUCTIONS TO THE CANADIAN DELEGATION

The information from Brussels reveals that the Brussels Conference on Migration has reached the following stage.

1. A general debate took place in which the main principles of the proposed organization were discussed. In the course of these discussions agreement was reached on the following:

(1) Each immigration country will retain complete control of selection standards and the numbers of immigrants.

(2) The contribution made by Canada to the Operating Fund would be drawn upon as required to pay on a cost basis for services rendered by the organization to Canada. The question of a non-recoverable contribution to the Operating Fund for practical measures to facilitate the emigration of Eastern European refugees will be considered at a later date once the organization is established.

(3) Largely at Canadian insistence, the Conference agreed to a reduction in the administrative budget of not less than a half million dollars. As compared to the proposed administrative budget of three million, the Conference has now agreed that the administrative budget should not exceed 2.5 million.

(4) The administrative budget will be allocated as follows:

3/9 to the United States
2/9 to emigration countries
2/9 to immigration countries
2/9 to other interested countries.

Allocations to countries within these groups will not be made until the organization is set up.

(5) The Conference decided that the organization will not provide selection or embarkation facilities.

2. A resolution has now been put before the Conference which, if adopted, will establish an organization to be called "Provisional Committee for the Movement of European Migrants". The Provisional Committee will deal with the plan of operations, the budget, and the terms and conditions under which available funds will be spent. Membership in the Committee will be drawn from countries voting for the resolution, and will be open to countries which undertake to make an agreed financial contribution to the Committee. It is the understanding of our Delegation that only countries voting for the resolution will have an opportunity to examine the whole project and budget in further detail and make appropriate revisions.

3. When the Cabinet last considered this matter on November 21st, 1951, the Delegation was authorized to commit Canada in principle to joining the proposed organization provided that certain principles were met. These principles have now been met, with the exception of:

(1) The administrative budget has not been sufficiently curtailed (the agreed cut is between 15% and 20% of the proposed budget. The Canadian Delegation was pressing for a 50% cut).

(2) Assessments on individual countries have not yet been established.

(3) Contributions to the Operating Fund to facilitate the emigration of refugees from Eastern Europe have not been determined.

It is understood that these matters will be considered in detail by the Provisional Committee and that final decisions will be subject to agreement by the individual countries concerned.

4. It is recommended that the Delegation be authorized to support the resolution establishing the Provisional Committee subject to the clear understanding that the Delegaion will continue to press strongly for further reductions in the administrative budget, and that any assessment on Canada will be subject to approval by the Canadian Government.[32]

DESPATCH 7 Brussels, December 10, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

BRUSSELS MIGRATION CONFERENCE

The Migration Conference opened in Brussels on November 26 and ended on December 4. The following countries were represented:

Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Columbia, Denmark, France, Germany, Greece, Guatemala, Israel, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Norway, Peru, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom, the United States and Venezuela.

[32] Approuvé par le Cabinet, le 4 décembre 1951./Approved by Cabinet, December 4, 1951.

The representatives of Argentina, Denmark, Guatemala, Israel, Norway, Peru and Sweden attended in the capacity of observers. Official observers were also present from the Holy See, the Council of Europe, the Organization for European Economic Cooperation, the International Confederation of Free Trade Union, the United Nations, the International Labour Office, the Office of the High Commissioner for Refugees, the International Refugee Organization, the International Social Services, the International Confederation of Christian Trade Unions and the Standing Conference of Voluntary Agencies.

2. Mr. C.E.S. Smith, Director of Immigration, Department of Citizenship and Immigration, was Head of the Canadian Delegation and will no doubt report directly to his own Department on the accomplishments of the Brussels Conference. I am therefore reporting only as the representative of the Department of External Affairs on the Canadian Delegation and Mr. Smith has not had an opportunity to see this despatch.

3. Mr. P.W. Bird, Chief of the Canadian Government Immigration Mission in Germany and Austria, and Mr. R. Lamarre, Senior Labour Representative at the Canadian Government Immigration Mission in Germany, were members of the Canadian Delegation and were present throughout the conference. Mr. S. Pollock, International Economic Relations Division of the Department of Finance, spent one day with the delegation prior to the opening of the Conference and returned for a day and a half later when financial items were discussed.

4. The final action of the Migration Conference was to adopt a resolution establishing a Provisional Inter-governmental Committee for the Movement of Migrants from Europe. Those countries which voted for the resolution, and thus agreed in principle to become members of the Committee, met from December 5th to 8th in the first session of the Committee.

5. The United Kingdom abstained when the resolution to establish the Committee was put to the vote because the United Kingdom Government has not yet decided to participate in the Committee's work. However, as an indication of the interest which the United Kingdom is showing in this project, the delegation of that country attended the first session of the Committee and took an active part in discussions, although they abstained when votes were taken.

6. Although Austria voted for the resolution establishing the Committee and stated that they are anxious to participate in the Committee's work, the delegation of that country was unable to be present at the first session. Turkey also voted for the resolution and is expected to be a member, but was not represented at the first session.

7. The countries represented at the first session of the Committee were the following:

Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, France, Germany, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Switzerland, the United Kingdom and the United States.

8. Mr. Franz Leemans, Head of the Belgian Delegation, was unanimously elected chairman of the Conference and subsequently of the Committee. As the work of the Conference and of the Committee were closely linked, I shall not report separately on each, and this report will outline the decisions both of the Conference and of the Migration Committee.

Establishment of Provisional Committee:

9. Among the documents circulated prior to the Conference was included a draft resolution to establish a Provisional Committee for the Movement of Migrants from Europe. According to the original text of this draft resolution, the governments adopting the resolution would agree "to constitute a Provisional Committee for the Movement of European Migrants". The original text also provided "that membership in the Committee shall be open to governments with a demonstrated interest in the principle of the free movement of persons and which undertake to make an agreed financial contribution to the Committee."

10. The United States Delegation had intended that the Conference would begin with a general discussion to be followed immediately by a vote on the draft resolution. This procedure was not satisfactory to the Canadian Delegation and we insisted that further detailed discussion would be necessary before we could express an opinion with respect to the resolution. As a result of our efforts, it was agreed that financial problems and shipping questions should be given further attention by the Conference before calling for a vote on the resolution. Appropriate sub-committees were therefore established for this purpose.

11. When the sub-committees had completed their work, we were still not satisfied that the Conference had decided in sufficient detail the nature, scope, and methods of financing of the proposed new organization. To take account of our representations, therefore, it was agreed that a drafting sub-committee should be set up to examine carefully the text of the draft resolution.

12. In the drafting sub-committee the Canadian Delegation took the initiative in insisting that the purpose of the new organization should be clearly set out in the resolution; that the principles to guide its activities should also be clearly stated; that there should be an unequivocal statement that any undertaking to make a financial contribution would be subject to approval by the government concerned; and that the emphasis on relieving problems of "surplus population" in certain European countries should be removed.

13. Details concerning the text of the resolution as it finally emerged from the drafting sub-committee were reported in my letter No. 5 of December 8,† and I am satisfied that the final text of the resolution is a substantial improvement over earlier drafts. Attached as Annexe 1† to this despatch is a copy of the resolution which was approved by a vote of sixteen in favour (including Canada), none against and one abstention (United Kingdom).

Rules of Procedure:

14. I am attaching, as Annex 2† of this despatch, the Rules of Procedure for the Committee which were adopted by a resolution of the final meeting of the Committee.

Shipping:

15. A working party of experts on shipping met throughout the Conference and agreed that a technical inter-governmental sub-committee for the coordination of transport should be established by the Migration Committee. At meetings of the working party the Canadian Delegation was almost the only delegation able to produce statistical evidence to show that shipping services are required beyond those available through commercial services.

Financial Regulations:

16. I am attaching as Annex 3† to this despatch the Financial Regulations which were adopted by a resolution of the Committee at its final meeting.

Budget and Plan of Expenditure:

17. The original estimates for the administrative part of the budget for the Migration Committee amounted to $3,060,300. Largely as a result of the efforts of the Canadian Delegation during a preliminary review of the budget during the Conference, this total was reduced to $2,459,060. During subsequent examination of budget estimates by the Committee, the Canadian Delegation was almost alone in pressing for further reductions. Our proposals were resisted by Mr. Warren, Head of the United States Delegation, who maintained that it would not be safe to reduce the estimates further pending detailed submissions by the Director at the next session of the Committee when reliable figures concerning staff, office requirements, and other details could be presented.

18. As reported in our telegram No. 181 of December 8th,† we were successful in private conversations with members of the United States Delegation in obtaining a further reduction of $100,000 in the estimates, the cuts to be distributed among various portions of the budget as the Director may see fit. It was also agreed that the contingency reserve fund of $250,000. should be frozen until such time as the Committee may decide that the release of a part or all of this fund can be justified. The final estimates for the administrative part of the budget, therefore, amount to $2,359,060, of which $250,000 is for the time being frozen.

19. The possible contributions of member countries to the operating part of the budget were not discussed during the Brussels meetings except for a statement by the United States representative that the balance of their $10,000,000 appropriation will go to the operating fund after deduction of the United States share of administrative expenses. Contributions of other countries to the operating fund will be arranged in the near future by negotiation between the Director and the governments concerned.

20. I am attaching as Annexes 4†and 5† to this despatch the approved budget estimates for one year of operations and the proposed plan of expenditure for the same period. Appendix C attached to the Plan of Expenditure was slightly revised prior to its adoption to provide for details concerning estimated movements to individual Latin American countries, but unfortunately this amendment has not yet been circulated.

21. With respect to the contingency reserve fund in the administrative part of the budget, it is clearly stated in the resolution adopting the plan of expenditure "that the contingency reserve ... shall remain intact until such time as the Committee approves its use on the basis of a submission to be made by the Director, and subject to the further provision that, pending such approval, the proportion of the contingency reserve contributed by each member government shall remain at the disposal of that government until otherwise decided by the Committee."

Allocations:

22. I am attaching as Annex 6† to this despatch the scale of percentage contributions to the administrative part of the budget recommended by the Committee subject to approval by each of the governments concerned. Our telegram No. 182 of December 9th† explained the basis on which agreement was reached with respect to allocations, and unfortunately your telegram No. 164 of December 8th† on the same subject was not received in Brussels until the day following the conclusion of the Committee session. It is hoped, however, that you will agree that a percentage contribution of 8.4% for Canada is the best result that could be achieved at this Conference.

23. The Canadian Delegation fought vigorously for a percentage allocation lower than that of France, the United Kingdom, Germany and Italy, and we advanced all possible arguments to justify our position. The chief opposition came from those countries who consider themselves "sympathizers" and maintain that their interest in the Migration Committee is largely of a humanitarian nature. As they will not benefit directly from the migration movements to be effected by the Committee, their governments are reluctant to contribute large amounts to meet administrative expenses and they are anxious to make their contributions to the operating part of the budget larger by reducing their contributions to the administrative part. Opposition to our proposals came chiefly from the French delegate who also argued that in the group of "other interested" countries, France and the United Kingdom are allocated the largest percentage; but as the United Kingdom Government has not yet committed itself in principle to participate in the work of the organization, France is fearful lest its share will eventually have to be increased if the United Kingdom should not participate.

24. It was only with reluctance that France agreed to the compromise proposal of the United States that the highest contributor in any group of countries, excluding the United States, should not pay more than the highest contributor in any other group. By accepting this principle the Canadian contribution was reduced from 10% to 8.4% and the contributions of France and the United Kingdom were increased from 7.7% to 8.4%.

25. The Canadian Delegation agreed to the final scale of contributions as the best solution which could be reached at the present time, but we made it very clear that we had no authority to accept 8.4% and that the most we could do would be to recommend this percentage to the Canadian Government. It is understood that the percentage contributions listed in Annex 6 are to serve as a basis for negotiations by the Director with each of the governments concerned.

Appointment of Director:

26. This item on the agenda of the Migration Committee caused a great deal of difficulty because of political pressures originating in the United States. Mr. Warren, Head of the United States Delegation, had always assumed that Mr. Donald Kingsley, Director-General of I.R.O., would be the most suitable person to serve as Director of the new Migration Committee. It is understood that Kingsley would welcome this appointment for he had only reluctantly accepted the position of Agent General for Korean Relief and is known to be frustrated in the performance of his duties with UNKRA.

27. Some time before the United States Delegation left for Brussels, unfavourable stories about Kingsley began circulating in Washington and eventually it was decided that an organized "smear" campaign was being conducted in order to discredit Kingsley. This campaign is said to have been traced back to the political group in the United States headed by Senator MacCarran. At first it was thought that MacCarran had personal reasons for disliking Kingsley, and as MacCarran is Chairman of the Senate sub-committee which deals with certain appropriations (including appropriations for migration activities) it was realized that there would be small hope of obtaining any further appropriations for the new migration organization if Kingsley were appointed Director contrary to MacCarran's wishes. The situation changed hour by hour, but the latest rumours indicate that MacCarran himself is not strongly against Kingsley but has been influenced by other members of his political group who have been responsible for the anti-Kingsley campaign.

28. At the beginning of the Conference, the name of Mr. E.M. O'Connor, Commissioner, United States Displaced Persons Commission, was suggested as a rival candidate for the position of Director. O'Connor carried on a vigorous one-man campaign in Brussels with the support of the MacCarran group in the United States. As O'Connor was a member of the United States Delegation, Mr. Warren found himself seriously embarrassed. However, as O'Connor did not create a good impression his name was eventually eliminated from the list of possible candidates.

29. However, anti-Kingsley feeling had reached such a pitch in the United States that Mr. Warren was not able to obtain authority to support Kingsley's candidature, and eventually he was instructed to propose the name of General Gross, an American on military duty in Germany. A compromise candidate might have had some chance of success, but representatives of European countries were strongly against the appointment of an army man to head the new organization.

30. When the Committee reached this item on its agenda, a private meeting of heads of delegations took place which lasted until far into the night. Mr. Warren was in contact by telephone with Washington almost hourly and in the end he is said to have refused to nominate Gross in the face of strong European opposition.

31. As it was not possible to reach agreement, a compromise was finally worked out behind the scenes whereby Mr. Leemans, Chairman of the Committee, and Mr. Warren, agreed to serve as co-directors of the new organization until such time as a successor can be elected. A resolution embodying this compromise was adopted unanimously. It is understood that Mr. Warren, who has already returned to the United States, will seek approval for the appointment of Kingsley as Director at the next session of the Committee.

Headquarters:

32. The question of where the headquarters of the new organization should be established also involved lengthy discussion. Italy supported strongly the establishment of headquarters in Paris and the French Delegation supported this proposal. Most other delegations thought that it would be more practical to establish headquarters in Geneva where assets of I.R.O. could be taken over without unnecessary expense and without loss of time; and it was also suggested that Geneva was a more appropriate conference centre. Eventually a resolution was unanimously adopted providing that Geneva should be the site of the "provisional" headquarters until such time as the Committee is able to reach a definite decision in the light of a report to be submitted by the Director.

Next Session of the Committee:

33. It has been agreed that the second session of the Migration Committee will be convened in Geneva at the call of the chairman in approximately two months' time. If the chairman deems it necessary, he may convene the Committee at an earlier date.

summary may be of some interest and I shall be glad to furnish additional particulars on any point which you may wish to have clarified.

38. I regret that it has not been possible to obtain additional copies of the enclosed documents as the distribution office closed immediately after the Committee ended its session.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID EQUIPMENT

1. National Defence are now prepared to release the armament and ancillary equipment for a second division. Could you ask the Deputies, as you did before in the case of the first division, for a recommendation as to which country or countries should receive it.

2. Arrangements for replacement from the United States of the first division's equipment are progressing satisfactorily and should no unforeseen difficulties arise, the offer to NATO of a second division's equipment may be regarded as firm.

3. National Defence will be making available to A/V/M Campbell in Washington a detailed list of the equipment offered, for the information of the accredited representatives of member countries interested in the offer.

SECRET Ottawa, January 12, 1951

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION AND MUTUAL AID PROCEDURES

I am, as you suggested, sending copies of your memorandum of January 11th† to Mr. Wilgress, Mr. Wrong, and Mr. Pierce.

2. We had already begun to follow up the Prime Minister's suggestion that mutual aid should be allocated by NATO on the basis of a recommendation by the Supreme Commander, so that both Mr. Wilgress and Mr. Wrong will already be familiar with the problem. In my telegram No. 35 of January 5th† to Mr. Wilgress, I told him of the Prime Minister's proposal and said that the Prime Minister might wish to discuss these matters with him while he was in London. We also asked Mr. Wilgress for his views as to how the Prime Minister's suggestion could be worked out in practice. These we have not yet received, as Mr. Wilgress has replied that he first wished to discuss the whole problem with Mr. Robertson. We shall probably receive Mr. Wilgress' comments in a few days and, in the meantime, he will have your memorandum.

3. As you say, there are three types of mutual aid, each of which requires a somewhat different procedure for handling it. The procedure will also vary with the quantity and strategic importance of the offer.

4. In the case of existing equipment, our practice has been to make our offer in one of two ways. If we are offering something of considerable strategic importance, such as the equipment for one division, our offer is made formally in the Deputies by Mr. Wilgress, and the Deputies thereupon request the Standing Group to make a recommendation as to which country or countries should receive the equipment. The Standing Group recommendation is then passed back to the Deputies who forward it with their approval for the consideration of the Canadian Government. This is the way in which our offers of equipment of divisional scale have been handled. With smaller lots of equipment from stocks or from production, (i.e., where strategic considerations are not directly involved), we have simply used the Military Production and Supply Board, or its Permanent Working Staff. Our Representative, Mr. Gill, has tabled with the Board, for example, our offer of 300 radar sets. If the MPSB think they require a Standing Group recommendation, they pass it to the Standing Group, but in most cases of this type, the recommendation as to allocation is made by the MPSB to the Government concerned, either directly or through the Deputies. Now that the MPSB has gone out of existence, these functions will, of course, be performed by the new Defence Production Board.

5. Before questions of allocation can be dealt with by NATO, it is necessary for either the Standing Group or the Military Production and Supply Board, or both (depending on the degree of importance of the equipment offered) to confirm that a requirement for the equipment offered exists. It is also necessary for the Standing Group to have approved the type of equipment offered as military acceptable, in the case of equipment which it is proposed should be produced for NATO. Transfers of equipment from existing military stocks in relatively small quantities normally require only the approval of the Military Production and Supply Board.

6. There is in practice a good deal of flexibility in the procedures used by various countries and by NATO for handling various types of equipment. The pattern has not yet become fixed. We therefore have an opportunity of working out procedures along the lines of the Prime Minister's suggestion. In fact, the Defence Production Board, at its first meeting yesterday, was expected to recommend the appointment of a Co-ordinator of Defence Production, and according to press reports, the Board did recommend that a leading American industrialist should be appointed. We have heard from Mr. Wilgress that Mr. Reid Harod, President of the International General Electric Company, has been approached, but has not yet accepted. The Co-ordinator will have a similar status in dealing with the production problems of the European members as General Eisenhower will have as Supreme Commander of the integrated force. As Mr. Acheson said at Brussels, they want a production man to stand beside General Eisenhower. I wonder if the Co-ordinator's recommendations put forward to Governments, perhaps in the name of the Supreme Commander, would not meet the Prime Minister's point?

7. So far, I have been considering mutual aid offers of equipment, old and new. It may be more difficult to fit offers of services, such as air training, into the same pattern. In the case of an offer to train aircrew, for example, we have, as you know, been consulting the Standing Group directly and have asked them for a recommendation. As the terms of reference of the Supreme Commander's appointment state that he will be responsible for training forces committed to his command and for negotiating with member governments concerning the training of forces that are to be committed to his command, it may be possible to have him make a recommendation as to what military services of this sort member governments should undertake, so that here again there may be a way of following up the Prime Minister's suggestion.

8. These are my preliminary thoughts on the matter. I hope that we shall shortly be hearing from Mr. Wilgress, Mr. Wrong, and Mr. Pierce on the points you have raised and that we shall be able, together with officials of your Department, to develop more specific proposals in time for you to discuss them, if you wish, with General Eisenhower when he visits Ottawa.

9. As regards your comments on the future allocation of the Deputies and the Defence Production Board, we have already had Mr. Wilgress' comments. In his telegram No. 69 of January 9th,† Mr. Wilgress strongly recommends, for reasons that appear to me to be sound, that the Deputies themselves should not be moved from London, although he is in favour of developing closer working relations between NATO and O.E.E.C. on the economic side.

TELEGRAM 133 London, January 16, 1951

SECRET. IMMEDIATE.

Reference your telegrams No. 35 of January 8th† and No. 125 of January 13th,† Canadian mutual aid procedures.

1. As I had an opportunity to discuss these matters with Mr. Robertson, and as the Defence Production Board have met, and the joint meeting of the Deputies with General Eisenhower was held this morning, I am now able to make some general observations on our procedures for aiding other NAT countries.

Endorsation by Supreme Commander of Proposals for Canadian Aid

2. I think that it may be practical to arrange that major proposals to Canada from NAT agencies (or major offers by Canada through NAT agencies) are submitted to Eisenhower for endorsation. It is clear from the first meeting of the Defence Production Board that some relationship between the Coordinator of North Atlantic Production and the Supreme Commander is contemplated. It is also clear from Eisenhower's statement to the Deputies this morning that the Chairman of the Council Deputies will have direct access to the Supreme Commander. Such relationships are, however, quite likely to be informal in character and I think that we, as sponsors of the simplified NAT structure, should be cautious about putting forward proposals which will complicate procedures. In other words, we should not seek to have procedures adopted which would require formal reference of our proposals to Eisenhower but should rely on informal contacts. In practice, too, I believe that we should not seek to secure an Eisenhower endorsation for all proposals but should reserve this for important matters and then only for an expression of opinion on the principle, e.g., the importance or priority he attaches to a given project.

3. It should be borne in mind that the Production Coordinator will not take over his duties until February 15 and that there will probably be some delay before he can make use of a direct channel with the Supreme Commander. It is conceivable that Eisenhower, after his tour of European member countries, would be able to express an opinion as to the general usefulness of some of the projects we now have under consideration (F86 aircraft and air training facilities) and I suggest that we invite him to comment on these when he is in Ottawa.

Military Production for NAT Countries

4. I think that our inclination to encourage specific requests from NAT countries or from NAT agencies is open to objections. On the basis that deficiencies are large and varied and that any offer we make is likely to be oversubscribed I think that wherever practicable it is in the Canadian interest to come forward with offers of mutual aid as we did in the cases of divisional equipment and training facilities — both of which met with favourable responses. In the field of equipment, we should strive for a coordinated production programme — for our own fighting forces, for United States and other accounts and for aid to our NAT partners. If these three requirements are considered jointly and production plans made accordingly then the Canadian Government can decide what equipment they can make available under mutual aid and ensure that this fits into the Canadian production programme.

5. With regard to the mechanics of offering, my view is that we should follow the following procedures:

6. Offers of mutual aid should be made initially through the appropriate Ministerial Committee or when they are not in session, the Council Deputies in order that they may be brought to the attention of other Governments and NAT agencies. Such offers would be accompanied by a statement as to the NAT agency which would be responsible for processing the offer and recommending allocations. For instance, if we decide to offer training facilities for aircrew I would make a statement to this effect in Deputies explaining that details of the vacancies available have been communicated to the Standing Group and that those countries interested in taking advantage of the offer should obtain details and make bids through their accredited representatives and that in the case of bids exceeding vacancies available, the Standing Group would be asked to recommend allocations.

7. Which agency we should use to process the offer depends on its nature. Major quantities of military equipment, such as divisional equipment, F86 aircraft, etc., should, in my opinion, be processed through the Standing Group as the executive agency of the Military Representatives Committee, and they would recommend allocation on the basis of strategic need. Offers of surpluses or of individual items of military equipment such as AA No. 4 MK VI radar sets, artillery weapons, etc., should be processed through the Defence Production Board who will be asked to recommend allocations within general principles laid down by the Standing Group. In either case, the recommendations of the Military or Production Agency would be communicated direct to the Canadian authorities without referring the matter back to the Deputies.

8. In my telegram No. 31 of January 5th† I indicated that the question of responsibility for allocation was likely to be the subject of early discussions in the Standing Group and other NAT agencies. I should like to urge that in any such discussions we support the division of responsibility for allocation in the manner set out above.[1]

(B) SERVICE PROGRAMMES AND MUTUAL AID

50. Mr. Claxton reported that the object of the defence programme under consideration was to permit all reasonable measures required to strengthen the defence of Canada; to meet United Nations obligations in Korea and North Atlantic Treaty requirements in the Western European and North Atlantic Ocean areas; to build up the organization, training facilities, and equipment so that mobilization, if required, might be accomplished efficiently; and to obtain equipment, clothing, stores, arms and ammunition needed by the forces in the first year of a war. While the cost of the programme would be high, it represented the scale of effort necessary if the situation was to be taken seriously and was about all that could be done by July, 1954, without a modified manpower policy and a complete war economy. The country appeared to recognize the need for a greater defence effort. The United States was making preparations against a war in a year or two. It would be hard to accelerate further the manpower, equipment and construction elements of the programme. It would be difficult to meet the manpower targets of the programme but it was hoped that, with a vigourous recruiting campaign, this might be done.

The principal elements of the four-year programme (including measures already authorized) were:

Navy

(1) maintenance in present commission of 17 ships, as well as auxiliary vessels; commissioning from reserve of 14 ships as men became available; continuation of the approved programme of building 21 ships, 1 Arctic ice-breaker and 5 gate vessels; building an additional 7 destroyer-escorts, 1 controlled minelayer, 8 seaward defence patrol craft and 38 harbour craft; repurchase and refitting of 25 frigates and Bangors held in strategic reserve; procurement of necessary aircraft; and provision of tooling for the authorized naval construction programme and to provide some capacity to meet wartime deficiencies;

(2) raising of ceilings to: active force—20,450; reserve force - 12,300, including 500 women; civilian employees—11,500;

(3) provision of increased accommodation and training facilities, seaward defences at St. John's, Halifax and Esquimalt, magazine facilities in Newfoundland and on the Pacific Coast, and additional storage for R.C.N. aircraft; and replacement of construction at certain naval divisions;

(4) rearming of 9 destroyers with 3" 50 guns; provision of armament for additional ships and training facilities; and stockpiling of ammunition to provide training, initial outfits for all ships, and one outfit per ship in reserve;

(5) provision of naval stores for the expanded force and fleet and of mobilization stocks of barrack, camp and hospital equipment and clothing to outfit a navy of 55,000 in the first year of a war.

Army

(1) conversion of the Mobile Striking Force (3,500) to U.S.-type equipment and completion of its Arctic equipment; reorganization of the Canadian Army Special Force to make up 1 battalion for U.N. service, 1 regimental combat team for the European Integrated Force, and replacement units for rotation in the Integrated Force; reorganization of anti-aircraft defences to provide 4 active force composite batteries, 18 reserve heavy A/A regiments and 10 reserve light A/A regiments, with conversion to U.S. 90 mm. guns and fire control; limited expansion of R.C.E.M.E., Ordnance and other administrative units in view of increased strengths, the stationing of units abroad and conversion to U.S.-type equipment; and limited increase of training establishments to provide conversion training and additional instructors for the first year of mobilization;

(2) raising of ceilings to: active force-49,700; reserve force - 67,850, including 8,850 women; civilian employees-12,400;

(3) provision of additional permanent accommodation and prefabricated huts for the expanded force and for mobilization purposes;

(4) continuation of the conversion of the whole army to U.S.-type equipment; procurement in Canada of U.S.-type light military vehicles, including first-year requirements on mobilization; provision of clothing, equipment and barrack stores required to equip initially an army of 150,000 in the first year of a war.

Air Force

(1) development, for the defence of Canada, of: 9 regular and 10 reserve fighter-interceptor squadrons each with 18 CF-100 aircraft; a 31-station radar network (with U.S. collaboration); 2 reserve tactical fighter squadrons, each to be re-equipped with 18 CF-100's; 3 maritime squadrons with a total of 40 Lancasters (partly for North Atlantic Ocean requirements); 1 medium transport squadron with 16 Dakota's; 2 troop-carrier squadrons each with 16 C-119's; 1 four-engine long-range transport squadron; and 1 four-engine long-range area reconnaissance squadron;

(2) development, for the Integrated Force, of 7 fighter-bomber squadrons, each with 16 CF-100's (equipped with F-86's until 1954-55); 1 fighter-reconnaissance squadron with 16 CF-100's; 3 fighter-interceptor squadrons each with 25 F-86's; and an air material base overseas;

(3) provision of 3 additional schools to graduate 1200 NATO pilots and navigators annually, and of 3 additional air training schools and expanded ground training facilities for the R.C.A.F.;

(4) raising of ceilings to: active force-43,240, including 5,000 women; reserve force-25,000, including 2,500 women; civilian employees-9,169;

(5) provision of additional storage and maintenance facilities for the expanded force, with greater use of civilian contractors;

(6) provision of the following operational and training aircraft, additional to present holdings: 790 F-86's, 728 CF-100's, 900 Harvards, 345 T-33's (dual jets), 320 Expeditors, 68 troop, heavy and medium transport aircraft, 3 helicopters, and 26 Chipmunks;

(7) provision of a mobilization reserve of clothing, ammunition, bombs, barrack equipment, motor transport and prefabricated emergency accommodation for an air force of 100,000 in the first year of a war.

Defence Research Board

Expansion of research and development facilities.

The financial requirements for 1951-52 would be about $1,689 million, made up approximately as follows: Navy-$279 million; Army-$525 million; Air Force $703 million; administration (including the married quarters programme and some provision for civilian defence) $122 million; D.R.B.-$37 million; miscellaneous votes-$23 million. These estimates included the expenditure in 1951-52 of some $308 million on construction, $87 million on clothing and $56 million on ammunition. The total financial requirements of the programme in each of the subsequent three years, while very difficult to forecast, would be on something like the same order of magnitude.

These estimates did not allow for the transfer to NATO countries of certain U.K.-type A/A, signals and Field Force equipment, and their replacement by U.S.-type equipment at a cost of $240.2 million; the training of 1200 NATO aircrew at a cost of $174 million; or the transfer to NATO of 392 F-86 airframes, at a cost of $81 million. It was proposed that these costs be charged, over a four-year period, to mutual aid funds, with the possibility of some $312 million being required for these items in 1951-52. The military programme and these mutual aid items for 1951-52 therefore totalled some $2 billion.

The new service ceilings, which it is hoped to realize by 1951-52, would involve a total average monthly intake of about 175 officers and 1200 men.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, Jan. 22, 1951 — (15 sheets) — Cab.Doc. D273.)†

The proposed ceiling of 12,000 for the R.C.N. reserve would have to be cut to about 7,500 owing to training difficulties. Purchases of mobilization reserves of clothing for the three services proposed for 1951-52 would probably have to be reduced as they might not be obtainable without something like a full war economy. Similarly, expenditures on construction proposed for 1951-52 might have to be reduced in order to avoid undue dislocation of the civilian programme. As regards A/A defence, to meet the force requirements only 4 new reserve regiments would require organization. Bringing the A/A regiments up to strength could consume much of the reserve army manpower and it was planned, therefore, to use older men as well as women as far as possible. Expansion of the R.C.A.F. was the largest part of the programme and was made necessary by the air defence needs of Western Europe and Canada. As the R.C.A.F.'s resources would be stretched to the maximum, it could not undertake a more ambitious NATO air training scheme than that envisaged in the programme without considerable assistance from the United Kingdom. Great care had been taken, in preparing the programme, to exclude non-essential items.

While the whole $300 million mutual aid fund provided under the Defence Appropriation Act had not yet been spent, it had been earmarked. Therefore, the transfer of U.K.-type armament to NATO and its replacement, the provision of F-86 airframes to the United Kingdom and the NATO air training programme, which were being explored, would require additional mutual aid funds.

51. The Minister of Finance pointed out that the combined defence and mutual aid programme for 1951-52 of about $2 billion would represent some 10 per cent of the gross national product, or 12 per cent of the national income.

52. The Minister of National Health and Welfare wondered if the proposed defence and mutual aid programmes were not set too high.

53. The Prime Minister said he understood that the United Kingdom could be expected to spend about 12 per cent of its national income on defence in 1951-52. This would come close to the scale of the U.S. defence effort this year, although the latter was likely to be considerably greater in 1952. A Canadian programme of $2 billion would be comparable to the expected U.K. programme for 1951 on the basis of national income — although not on the basis of manpower, as there would be 1.75 per cent of the population in the U.K. forces. The United Kingdom was expanding its current programme despite the fact that it was not yet receiving much aid to its defence outlay from the United States. Disturbing as the cost of the proposed Canadian programme was, other NATO countries were having to make similar efforts; an effort of the order suggested was probably not more than Canada's fair share of the general defence burden.

54. Mr. Claxton said, with regard to Canadian force allocations under the Medium Term Plans, that Canada could shortly meet its Army allocation of one-third of a division for the Integrated Force. On the basis of presently-planned U.S. Army contributions to this Force, this should constitute for some time a fair contribution. The Navy allocation under the plans was reasonable, although it could not be met before 1954. The Air Force allocation, including 11 squadrons for the Integrated Force, was going to be hard to meet even by 1954. At Brussels, the North Atlantic Treaty Council had adopted a resolution urging member governments to consider rapidly completing the proposed contributions to the Integrated Force and making additional contributions. In the circumstances, General Eisenhower was likely to press for accelerated Canadian contributions to the Integrated Force.

55. Mr. Abbott suggested that it would be desirable to decide on a figure for the defence programme and then let the services recommend how it could best be spent. This figure, added to a sizeable civilian budget, would necessitate heavier taxes which would not be welcome. He thought, therefore, that an effort should be made to keep the military and mutual aid programme for 1951-52 within a total of $1.6 billion which should include any portion of the $300 million vote not used in the current fiscal year. He did not want to see contributions to the Integrated Force, the reconstruction of the Navy, or other essential projects curtailed, but thought that the programme included some items, such as permanent-type buildings and large amounts of clothing for mobilization purposes, which could be reduced without prejudice to the adequate development of the armed forces.

56. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, referring to the plan to have two army divisions ready and two in training by the end of the first year of a war, said that he had doubts about the advisability of planning for a large Canadian Army. He thought that the question of the division of manpower between the three services deserved careful review before the armed forces were greatly expanded.

57. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noted the new four-year defence programme proposed by the Minister of National Defence, it being understood that Mr. Claxton, before the matter was considered further, intended to examine, in conjunction with the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, the possibility of keeping the financial requirements for defence and mutual aid for 1951-52 within the limit of $1.6 billion, including any portion of the $300 million vote provided under the Defence Appropriation Act that was not used during the current fiscal year.

NORTH ATLANTIC COUNCIL DEPUTIES: OFFER OF A SECOND DIVISION'S EQUIPMENT BY THE CANADIAN GOVERNMENT. D-D(51)18.†

1. In presenting my memorandum† on the offer of second division's equipment by the Canadian Government, I drew the attention of the deputies to paragraph 3, emphasizing that this offer could be considered firm providing the Canadian Government was able to make a satisfactory arrangement for replacing this equipment by purchase from the United States Government.

2. The Danish Deputy suggested that the last paragraph of my memorandum should be amended to state that the Military Representatives Committee would recommend the allocation of equipment. I explained to him that not all the countries would be interested in bidding for the Canadian equipment and it was for that reason that I suggested the Standing Group should recommend its allocation. I pointed out that before making its allocation the Standing Group would undoubtedly call in those countries which were interested in bidding for all or part of the equipment.

3. Achilles said that the free transfer of two divisions of equipment was a very significant and commendable action on the part of the Canadian Government and that he hoped that they would not be too modest to give it full publicity. I assured Achilles that we would do so.

4. The Standing Group are being asked to recommend allocation of the equipment on the basis of strategic need.

OFFER OF GUNS TO LUXEMBOURG UNDER NATO MUTUAL AID

1. During his visit to Ottawa, General Eisenhower told Mr. Claxton that he was much impressed by the efforts being made by Luxembourg to raise the maximum number of men for their armed forces. He said, however, that there was an acute shortage of equipment which was hampering their efforts.

2. Mr. Claxton thereupon undertook to see whether some equipment could not be made available to Luxembourg under the Canadian Mutual Aid Programme to NATO countries. As Mr. Claxton was most anxious that action should be taken immediately on General Eisenhower's recommendation, Mr. Wrong advised LeGallais in Washington of the offer which he telephoned his Government. At the same time, General Gruenther had the matter raised in the Standing Group who said that, as the Luxembourg forces are now largely equipped with U.S.-type equipment, their only immediate recommendation was that the Canadian Government should offer Luxembourg 24 25-pounder guns.

3. Would you please make this ex post facto offer in the Deputies at the first opportunity, explaining the special circumstances of General Eisenhower's recommendation which led us to deal directly with the Luxembourg Government and the Standing Group. The position now is that Mr. Claxton expects to make an announcement of the offer tomorrow and you might therefore, at the same time, inform the Deputies and ask for their blessing on the action taken.

4. In your telegram No. 228, you reported that the Acting Chairman of the Deputies had expressed the hope that the Canadian Government would give suitable publicity to the offer of the Second Division's equipment. We shall try to let you know in advance when the announcement will be made here, but it is possible that Mr. Claxton may make an announcement at any time. If we cannot let you know in advance, we shall send you the text as soon as we can after the announcement.

CANADIAN FORCE CONTRIBUTIONS —
NATO MEDIUM TERM DEFENCE PLANS — 1954

1. The NATO Council passed a resolution on 18 September, 1950, which read: The Council "recommends that Member Governments, upon being advised by the Council of the provisions of the revised Medium Term Defence Plan and the respective contributions required thereby, consider as a matter of urgency the acceptance of the Plan and the taking of such measures as may be necessary as rapidly as possible to meet the contributions required of them, on the assumption that the necessary complementary action in the fields of production and finance will be taken to provide the equipment required".

2. On 23 October, 1950, the Military Committee of NATO approved the NATO Medium Term Defence Plan as submitted by the Standing Group, but in view of the NATO Council resolution and the fact that the Canadian Government had not yet been informed about nor had authorized the allocation of Canadian forces as called for in the Plan, the Canadian representative reserved the Canadian position. The Medium Term Plan was approved shortly afterwards by the NATO Defence Committee but still with the reservations qualifying the forces earmarked as Canadian contributions.

3. The NATO Deputies have since requested that all member countries should make known by 10 January, 1951, what they were prepared to do in supplying forces for the Western European Integrated Force. This was in order that studies might proceed and proposals be circulated by 1 February, 1951, on steps which should be taken to close the gap between the sum of national force contributions and of NATO defence requirements as called for in the Medium Term Plan—1954.

4. The Canadian Defence Programme, as considered by Cabinet at its meeting on 24 January, 1951, provides for sufficient forces to meet the force allotments requested from Canada in the Medium Term Defence Plans—1954.

5. Attached is the text of a letter, for which Cabinet approval is recommended, authorizing the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington to table with the Standing Group a Canadian undertaking (subject to the approval of Parliament) to provide the forces, as shown, for the NATO Medium Term Plan—1954.

We have just been advised that the Standing Group have decided to recommend that the Canadian mutual aid offer of equipment for a second division should be allocated to Belgium. The Deputies should no doubt formally convey this recommendation to the Canadian Government, but Mr. Claxton feels it is desirable to make an announcement to the House tomorrow afternoon. Would you therefore inform the Belgian Government officially as soon as possible that the Canadian Government, on the recommendation of the Standing Group, have decided to offer equipment for one division to Belgium.

2. Lists of the equipment have already been made available to the Belgian Government through their military representatives in Washington.

3. It is expected that, in accordance with the procedure followed in the case of the equipment for one division given last November to The Netherlands Government,[3] the Canadian Government will be responsible for delivering equipment for the Belgian Government to seaboard, either at Halifax or Saint John, and that arrangements for onward shipment will be the responsibility of the Belgian Government. The majority of the equipment is already packed and ready in Montreal, and an early reply would be appreciated.

4. If the Belgian Government wish to make an announcement, Mr. Claxton would be grateful if their statement could be issued in Brussels to coincide with the announcement he wishes to make in Parliament at 3:00 P.M. our time Thursday, February 8.[4] We shall, if possible, send you the text of Mr. Claxton's statement tomorrow morning, or in any case immediately after he has made the announcement in the House for any additional publicity you may be able to obtain.

MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME

Since the commencement of our Mutual Aid Programme we have used both the London and Washington agencies to advise NATO members of the availability of such aid. In each case the Standing Group has been responsible in the final analysis for making the recommendation to Canada for its allocation.

2. Through these two Canadian agencies we have explored the possibility of No. 4 MK VI radar being classified militarily acceptable NATO equipment. We then declared 100 sets available. We followed it up with another 200 sets making a total of 300. We have made army equipment available in two stages with a third issue coming up. We have obtained the Standing Group's recommendation on the allocation of F86 airframes. We have given artillery to Luxembourg. In the handling these projects our procedures have not been consistent and the Standing Group have asked informally what procedure we are following.

3. In order to clarify and simplify the method of handling Canadian mutual aid equipment or facilities such as training it is recommended that the following procedure be followed.

(a) The Canadian Deputy should announce in the Council of Deputies giving full particulars that certain equipment or facilities are being made available by Canada and that any nation that is interested in receiving an allocation of same should advise their military representative in Washington to make their application to the Standing Group.

(b) At the same time the Chiefs of Staff Committee would advise the Military Representative in Washington of the availability of equipment or allocation of facilities and ask for a Standing Group's recommendation on distribution.

(c) The channel to the Deputies on Mutual Aid would be for the information of Governments and the action channel would be through the National Military Representatives who in turn would deal with the Standing Group which organization has to make the recommendation. To do so requires a certain amount of military investigation and requires day-to-day information to assist them.

4. The foregoing procedure would have the effect of letting the member nations know on the highest level the aid that Canada is providing and would shorten and simplify the action procedures.

5. Whilst in London I discussed this allocation problem with Evan Gill and he was of the opinion that small quantities could be handled on a "Shopping List" basis.

These small quantities could be disposed of on information that is available in the Defense Production Board. To this I think you have agreed. This seemed to be a practical method of allocating small amounts of equipment and I do not suggest that any change should be made in this procedure for small quantities. We should ensure however that what we allocate on this basis should be done on the basis of information available to our representative on the DPB and if he is not in a position to finalize it it should be referred back to Ottawa and handled in line with the suggested procedure in para 2.

6. If you agree to the foregoing we should advise the NATO Agencies in London and Washington of our intended procedure.[5]

1. We give you below some additional general comments on the subject of allocation and some specific comments on Campbell's message CJS(W)154.

2. Responsibility for advising on allocation of military equipment being a military one, the Standing Group is naturally the appropriate agency to perform this function. In doing so they will no doubt on occasions rely on SHAPE or the Supreme Commander's organizations for guidance as the latter will know the state of training and mobilization of the various elements of the integrated force. It should perhaps be borne in mind that allocation of items scheduled for long-term delivery might possibly be subject to change in the light of developments, e.g. the Canadian No. 4 Mk. VI radar sets, and that what is needed initially is a tentative allocation which should be subject to review before deliveries are made.

3. If the Standing Group feel disposed to use the services of the Defence Production Board and give the board general guidance under which it could allocate, we hold the view (as previously expressed in telegrams Nos. 2394 of December 6th and 133 of January 16th)† that the Defence Production Board could perform a useful service in this field. This view is based mainly on practical considerations, e.g. the location, composition and related activities of the board. Furthermore, the board will on occasions be making recommendations on allocation of production tasks and it may be desirable on such occasions to suggest allocation of the end products. Rather than refer all such questions to the Standing Group it seems to us sensible that the board should where possible recommend such allocations on the basis of general principles enunciated by the Standing Group. We do not favour a procedure which would involve processing such matters through the two North Atlantic agencies.

[5] Envoyé à Londres, N° 298, 13 février 1951.
Forwarded to London as No. 298 of February 13, 1951.

4. Actually the cases calling for advice on allocation are not numerous now and the majority are Canadian offers as we are the only country whose policy it is to seek such advice. The United States make their offers of end item aid outside NATO and the United Kingdom who have offered a fair amount of surplus stock invite bids through the Defence Production Board and then decide allocation themselves. The only other major transaction was the 30 dollars million worth of OMA stocks offered by Belgium which was handled through the MPSB with military advice being sought on competitive items through the United States military advisory group (JAMAG).

5. In general, therefore, we reaffirm the view previously expressed that it is premature to consider the establishment of a new military agency for allocation purposes and we believe it would be unwise for the Standing Group to take a firm stand that all allocation must be done by them. We question whether it is necessary to take a hard and fast decision at this time and we think it would be better to proceed on an ad hoc basis for the time being with the Standing Group recommending allocations when they are asked to do so and the Defence Production Board recommending allocations when they are asked to do so or when called for in connection with their production programming, on the understanding of course that they would operate under the guidance of the Standing Group and they would refer to the Standing Group in cases of doubt. This is the type of arrangement that we hoped would be concluded between the Standing Group and the board but no progress has yet been made. The present position, as we reported in telegram No. 302 of February 6th† is that the Standing Group are formulating their policy and will shortly send representatives to London to discuss the matter with representatives of the Defence Production Board.

6. As regards Campbell's recommendations, we think it important that detailed offers of any equipment should be made through the agency which will advise on allocation. In practice it sometimes happens that the offering country is asked to supply additional information regarding specifications, conditions, etc., of the equipment offered. By the same token, the bidding countries must be asked to supply certain information in support of their bids. The type of information needed might vary. For administrative reasons we do not favour an offer being made in detail through one agency and the processing of the offer in another agency. While I shall continue to announce Canadian offers in Deputies so as to bring them to the attention of other governments, I do not wish to make these in sufficient detail for countries to submit their bids. In the offers I have made to date I have usually indicated the NATO agency which is handling the matter.

7. To summarize:

(a) Offers of mutual aid should be made in Deputies in general terms only to bring them to the notice of other governments.

(b) Details of the offer with full particulars regarding the terms, delivery, condition, quantities, should be made through one NATO agency, which would process the offer from the first step which is to notify countries of the details and invite bids to the final step which is to recommend allocations.

(c) Pending the outcome of the forthcoming discussions between representatives of the Standing Group and the Defence Production Board all Canadian offers should be processed through the Standing Group.

DEFENCE PROGRAMME; NATO DEVELOPMENTS

14. The Minister of Finance, referring to discussions at the meetings of January 24th and February 5th, 1951, said that there seemed to be some uncertainty as to what was included in the $1.6 billion defence programme for 1951-52. It would be recalled that $300 million had been appropriated by Parliament at the previous session for mutual aid purposes under the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. It was not expected that much more than one third of this appropriation would have been used by the end of the fiscal year. It was his understanding that what was left in this vote would be included in the total of $1.6 billion for 1951-52.

15. The Minister of National Defence said he had been under the impression that the remaining portion of the $300 million voted last year could be carried forward and used for mutual aid purposes in addition to the $1.6 billion. However, it would be desirable to have this point clarified in order that conflicting undertakings were not given to NATO members.

16. The Prime Minister pointed out that it had been understood that $1.6 billion would constitute the total cost of our defence effort in 1951-52. In the circumstances, it was suggested that it should be made clear to NATO members that the Canadian defence programme for the year 1951-52 would involve a total expenditure of $1.6 billion and that this total included all mutual aid for the years 1950-51 and 1951-52 except that portion of the $300 million vote against which actual charges had been made during the year 1950-51.

17. Mr. Claxton reported that the United States were exerting considerable pressure on NATO countries, particularly the European members, to increase their defence efforts. At the present time, the Standing Group were endeavouring to devise some means of measuring the various national contributions in more general terms.

The Chairman of the Chiefs of Staff Committee and the Chief of the General Staff would shortly discuss with U.S. military authorities the future disposition of that portion of the Canadian Special Force still at Fort Lewis. If the Unified Command indicated clearly that these men were not required in Korea, it would be desirable to ascertain whether they should be sent to Europe at a reasonably early date.

18. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that, in discussing with the Americans the disposition to be made of Canadian forces presently at Fort Lewis, every care should be taken not to leave an impression which would permit the assertion at some future date that Canadian soldiers had not been sent to Korea because Canada had requested that they be dispatched to Europe.

19. Mr. Claxton reported that the United Kingdom had not at the present time any aircraft capable of competing successfully with the Soviet M-15. A request had been received for the supply to the United Kingdom of 392 F-86 jet fighters. It was suggested that the United Kingdom should be informed that, if they could negotiate direct with the United States for the engines and other components required, Canada would consider building the 392 airframes and completing assembly. In this connection, it should be noted that some difficulty was being experienced in obtaining from the United States sufficient engines to meet production requirements for Canada.

20. Mr. Claxton further reported that the United Kingdom had inquired whether Canada would consider providing training facilities for a substantially larger number of aircrew than at present. Existing facilities would not permit any significant increase in the number of U.K. aircrew trainees. Furthermore, Canada was at the present time providing very substantial aid to NATO members and particularly to the United Kingdom. It might therefore usefully be suggested to the United Kingdom at this time that some arrangements be made for a measure of reciprocation.

21. Mr. St-Laurent suggested that arrangements might be made under which each NATO country would agree to assume financial responsibility for all or a substantial portion of whatever NATO undertakings were conducted within the confines of that country.

22. The Cabinet, after considerable further discussion, noted the remarks of the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Finance on defence appropriations for the coming fiscal year and on North Atlantic Treaty Organization mutual aid.

V. CANADIAN MUTUAL AID PROGRAMME

24. A general discussion of the Canadian mutual aid programme for North Atlantic countries took place touching on the tentative programme; the need for procedures for interdepartmental clearance and the pricing of items to be charged to Canadian mutual aid funds; allocation procedures; and possible Canadian production orders in NATO countries.

25. The Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce said that his department had prepared a consolidation of the tentative Canadian mutual aid programme, commenting on the status of each major part of the programme and showing what had been approved by the government, what was under consideration, and approximately how much would have to be spent during the next fiscal year, and during future years, if all items were to be approved.

Two explanatory memoranda were circulated.

(Memoranda, Dept. of Trade and Commerce, Feb. 15, 1951 — Panel Documents ED-35A and ED-35B.)†

26. Mr. Beaupré pointed out that the estimated cash requirements for 1951-52 for mutual aid, assuming the whole programme were to be approved, were approximately $286 million. On the assumption that $243 million would be carried over under Section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, authority for the expenditure of an additional $43 million would have to be obtained. This was, therefore, the sum which his department was proposing should be included, in respect of mutual aid, in the estimates for the new Defence Production Department.

The consolidation had perhaps not succeeded in entirely eliminating all "double entries", i.e., charges which might at present stand not only against the National Defence estimates, but also against the estimates for the new Defence Production Department. For example, that part of the $57 million, which would have to be earmarked for the Department of National Defence for its replacement programme of the equipment for the second division being offered to Belgium, might also appear in the $108 million which Cabinet had approved as an encumbrance to be charged to Section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act for the manufacture in Canada of U.S.-type arms and ammunition for the Army's replacement programme.

27. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, said that the Chiefs of Staff were now hoping that the United States Government would be able to sell replacement equipment for another division "off the shelf" so that it might not be necessary to rely on Canadian manufacture for the second division's equipment to be given to Belgium. If this hope were realized, it might be possible for the government to consider offering equipment for a third division to NATO. Under present plans, the replacement equipment for the first division could be expected by June of this year, with the exception of tanks. The equipment for Belgium would probably be shipped next month, and it would be possible for the equipment for a third division, if offered, to be shipped by the end of this year.

28. Mr. Beaupré referred to the recommendations of the North Atlantic Task Forces which had been considered at the January 19th meeting. A request had been received from the Defence Production Board for all NATO countries to table their industrial capacity in certain sectors related to defence, such as shipbuilding. He enquired whether the Panel thought that his department should table Canadian capacity as requested which would clearly, he thought, imply that the government was prepared to consider a recommendation that this capacity be used by expanding the Canadian NATO mutual aid programme. He wondered whether it was out of the question for a charge to be made for capacity so used, or whether it was the fixed policy of the government that anything offered to NATO would be given away.

29. The Chairman recalled his suggestion at an earlier meeting that a pricing formula might serve to arrive at a more realistic appraisal of relative needs of NATO countries than the present system, whereby Canada offered equipment without any definite idea as to the specific needs of interested countries, and had therefore to rely on a Standing Group or Defence Production Board recommendation as to where the equipment should be sent. He thought that there might be some merit in the suggestion that additional Canadian capacity might be put to work in key sectors and the product offered to NATO at an arbitrary figure based on the going European price, the difference (if any), including capital charges, being absorbed by Canada. In principle, he saw no objection to a proportion of Canadian defence production being paid for by interested NATO countries.

30. Mr. MacKay agreed that there was nothing to prevent the government from combining a mutual aid programme, part of which would be offered as a gift and part offered for sale. In addition, there was the possibility, which had been raised by Mr. Gill, of spending some mutual aid funds to place orders for production in European countries for the Canadian forces or for mutual aid.

31. Mr. Beaupré observed that no specific requests had been received from individual North Atlantic countries for anything from Canadian production and he suggested that Canadian representatives, instead of seeing what Canada might usefully give away, should wait for definite requests.

32. Mr. Robertson doubted that Canada's allies would wish to ask directly for individual gifts and felt that such a policy would have a paralysing effect on the Canadian mutual aid programme. He did not believe that the $300 million appropriation already voted necessarily exhausted the government's intentions in regard to mutual aid. A supplementary programme might be conceived using, as he had suggested, some pricing formula which might help Canada to utilize its maximum capacity in priority items, with U.S. help where necessary, as in the case of the F-86 programme in which any expansion was contingent on the supply of U.S. engines.

33. Mr. Heeney reported that the High Commissioner in London had recommended that, pending discussion of allocation procedures by representatives of the Standing Group and the Defence Production Board, recommendations for allocation of all Canadian offers of mutual aid should be processed through the Standing Group, as soon as the offer had been made to the Deputies.

Explanatory documents had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Dept. of External Affairs, Feb. 14, 1951 — Panel Document ED-34;† and Telegram No. 376 of February 15th from the High Commissioner, London.)

34. Mr. Robertson pointed out that the refusal of the United States to furnish components for the Canadian production of F-86 aircraft for the United Kingdom was based on the U.S.A.F.'s plan for building up 100% reserves. This raised the important general question of how to ensure that the resources of NATO countries were allocated in such a way as to ensure that they would attain the maximum overall strength. While the government would not favour an agency with powers to allocate the national resources of NATO countries, a question like that of the appropriate allocation of U.S. resources of F-86 components could usefully be taken up with the U.S. authorities on a bilateral basis or, possibly, in co-operation with the United Kingdom.

35. Dr. Clark proposed the establishment of a sub-committee or panel to consider and make recommendations on matters going before the Panel.

36. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed that:

(a) a sub-panel should be set up to give preliminary consideration to the questions that had been discussed under the heading of "Canadian Mutual Aid Programme" and to other North Atlantic and defence matters coming before the Panel; the sub-panel to consist of representatives of the Departments of Trade and Commerce, National Defence, Finance and External Affairs, to meet as required and to work under the general direction of the Chairman of the Panel;

(b) the terms of reference of the Panel, together with this minute, could be taken as sufficient terms of reference for the sub-panel for the time being;

(c) the amount of the appropriation for mutual aid should be specified in the estimates of one department and should be administered by that department;

(d) pending discussion of allocation procedures by the Standing Group and the Defence Production Board, all further Canadian offers of mutual aid should be processed through the Standing Group and the Deputies; the Standing Group being asked to make a recommendation as to the allocation of the offer at the same time as the Deputies were informed of the offer.

VI. MUTUAL OFFSET OF MILITARY EXPENSES BY NATO COUNTRIES AND CANADA

37. The Deputy Minister of National Defence suggested that the time had come to consider the possibility of recovering from countries assisted by Canada some return in goods, training facilities and services. The first step in the direction of such reciprocal mutual aid might take the form of an approach to the United Kingdom Government for assistance in meeting the expenses of the R.C.A.F. squadrons at present attached, and shortly to be attached, to the R.A.F. for advanced training in the United Kingdom. It would be difficult to treat in a similar way the expenses incurred as a result of the Canadian contribution to the Integrated Force, as the United States Government would probably be asked, on a repayment basis, to move the Canadian component of the Integrated Force, and the expenses that Canadian units would incur in travelling through Holland or Belgium on their way to the U.S. zone of Germany would be negligible.

38. The Panel:

(a) agreed to the suggestion of the Deputy Minister of National Defence that the R.A.F. be asked by his department to meet the expenses of R.C.A.F. squadrons posted in the United Kingdom for training; and

(b) agreed that the question of possible additional forms of reciprocal aid be given consideration by the Sub-Panel.

VI. AIR FORCE DEVELOPMENTS

21. The Minister of National Defence, referring to the discussions in Cabinet on December 28th, 1950 and January 24th, 1951, said that the Chief of the Air Staff had been in Washington on February 16th for discussions on aircraft procurement with General Vandenberg, Chief of Staff, United States Air Force. It would be useful to have a report on these talks.

22. The Chief of the Air Staff explained that his conversations with General Vandenberg had been chiefly concerned with jet engines, two-seater jet trainers and Harvards.

Jet Engines for F-86's

The R.C.A.F. had previously indicated to the U.S.A.F. a requirement of 35 sets of government-furnished property, including jet engines, per month for the Canadian F-86 production programme for the R.C.A.F. In addition, the R.A.F. had requested the U.S.A.F. to furnish 15 sets per month in connection with the proposal that Canada produce 392 F-86 airframes for the R.A.F. When the R.A.F. had been informed by the U.S.A.F. that the 15 jet engines a month could not be made available, the Chief of the Air Staff, R.A.F., had enquired whether Canada could make some complete F-86's available to the United Kingdom and had been told that none could be spared. The Chief of the Air Staff, R.A.F., had since indicated that he was endeavouring to re-allocate Avon engines from other projects in the hope that they could be adapted to the F-86 airframes. This might permit resumption of consideration of the proposal to make these airframes in Canada for the R.A.F.

During the discussions he had had on February 16th, General Vandenberg had at first indicated to him that, as the shortage of jet engines for the F-86 was critical, it would not be possible to raise Canada's allocation from 11 to 35 a month. After considerable discussion, he had agreed to instruct his staff to make a total of 20 per month available to Canada. While this would not meet the whole programme for the development of R.C.A.F. squadrons between now and the summer of 1952, the increased rate of availability of engines expected after August, 1952, would result in the programme not being far behind schedule by the end of that year. In the meantime, squadrons would be built up but with, at the start, less aircraft than the 25 planned.

23. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he saw no means of improving on the planned rate of production of the Canadian Orenda jet engine — intended for the CF-100 aircraft programme. About 100 would be produced in 1951 and substantially more in 1952, but there would be none to spare for the F-86 aircraft programme.

Two-Seater and Twin-Engine Trainers

24. Air Marshall Curtis had been informed in Washington that there was also a great shortage of American T-33 two-seater jet trainers (required for training F-86 pilots) and that, as U.S.A.F. requirements were so great, none could be spared to meet the R.C.A.F. requirement of 345 by the end of 1952. Eventually, General Vandenberg had agreed to release 20 of these aircraft or Canada. This would enable the R.C.A.F. to start advanced flying schools in the autumn and, in the meantime, to review the situation and determine what other arrangements could be made to obtain aircraft of this type. The T-33 airframes were in shorter supply in the United States than the jet engines required for this type of aircraft. It might be necessary to manufacture the airframes in Canada. Again, it might be possible to obtain some U.S. F-80's, as a substitute, should the fighting end soon in Korea.

The situation with regard to twin-engine trainers was bad but Canadair, which was interested in this type of aircraft, was submitting plans and specifications to the U.S.A.F. in the hope of building a twin-engine trainer that would be of use to both Canada and the United States.

Harvards

While, some time ago, the U.S.A.F. had agreed to sell to Canada 100 Harvard aircraft at a low price, it had proved impossible for it to carry out this arrangement. As a result of his discussions in Washington, however, he believed that the U.S.A.F. would lend these aircraft to the R.C.A.F. for a period of two years, provided they were returned to the U.S.A.F. In view of the shortage of other types of aircraft, which would necessitate improvisation in the training programme, it might be necessary to borrow some 200 Harvards on these terms.

Training of Aircrew for NATO

25. Mr. Claxton, referring to the discussions in Cabinet on December 28, 1950,[6] January 24, 1951 and February 15, 1951, said that, in a letter of February 6, 1951,† the Right Honourable Arthur Henderson, Secretary of State for Air in the United Kingdom, had indicated the hope, on various grounds, that the entire facilities which were being established in Canada for training an additional 1100 NATO aircrew a year could be made available for R.A.F. trainees. The Air Ministry was prepared to provide a considerable proportion of the instructional and other staff required for these facilities. It understood the Canadian policy of acting in such matters through NATO machinery, but needed an early decision on this question for purposes of efficient planning. It expected to make bids to the Standing Group for still further training facilities in North America in view of the expanded U.K. defence programme.

He had drafted a reply to Mr. Henderson indicating, inter alia, that, in view of Canada's position as a member of NATO, it was felt that there was no alternative to the vacancies for the additional 1100 NATO aircrew a year being allocated on the advice of the Standing Group; that there were a number of factors, such as the ability of the R.A.F. to provide fighter aircraft for its men as soon as they had been trained in Canada, that would doubtless influence the advice given by the Standing Group; that there were several real difficulties in the way of offering still further training facilities for NATO aircrew at present; and that it would be mutually advantageous if a group of Service and financial experts of the two countries were to meet in the near future to consider how far the U.K. Services might provide reciprocal mutual aid.

He recommended approval of a reply to Mr. Henderson along these lines.

26. Air Marshal Curtis said that the Standing Group Sub-Committee on Air Training had met in Washington and had indicated that NATO requests for air training facilities in North America far exceeded present facilities in the United States and Canada. The Sub-Committee was considering the matter further and would be making recommendations in about two months' time.

27. The Committee, after further discussion:

(a) noted the report of the Chief of the Air Staff on the present position with regard to the availability of jet engines for F-86 aircraft and of two-seater, twin-engine and Harvard trainers;

(b) noted the report of the Minister of National Defence that the Secretary of State for Air in the United Kingdom had requested allocation to the R.A.F. of the entire facilities being established in Canada for the training of an additional 1100 NATO aircrew a year, and that the United Kingdom would be applying to the Standing Group for further facilities for R.A.F. trainees; and approved the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence that he reply to the effect that allocation of the 1100 vacancies would have to be subject to the advice of the Standing Group; that there were obstacles to offering further vacancies for NATO aircrew trainees at present; and that it would be advantageous for Service and financial experts of the two countries to hold an early meeting to discuss the possibilities of the United Kingdom Services providing reciprocal mutual aid.

DEFENCE ESTIMATES AND PROGRAMME

42. The Minister of National Defence recalled that, at the meeting of January 24th, he had put forward estimates for a four-year defence programme, including married quarters, civil defence and some capital assistance. In those estimates the financial requirements for the year 1951-52 were shown as $1,689 million plus some $312 million which would be required for mutual aid to North Atlantic Treaty countries, or a total of some $2 billion.

In accordance with the decision at that time, these financial requirements had been re-examined to determine whether they could be brought within a figure of $1.6 billion. New estimates had now been prepared contemplating commitment authority for 1951-52 of $2,166 million, covering defence requirements proper, housing, civil defence, mutual aid and capital assistance (including an additional $50.8 million capital assistance to come under the proposed Department of Defence Production). As payments totalling about $300 million were not expected to come due in 1951-52, the actual disbursements anticipated in that year amounted to some $1,866 million. If cash credits of about $120.5 million, derived from mutual aid funds during 1950-51, were deducted from this sum, the revised estimates for 1951-52 would require, therefore, a cash appropriation of approximately $1,746 million.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, "Defence Summary", with attached analysis of charges to mutual aid funds.)†

If an additional 300 Canadian 3.7 inch anti-aircraft guns were transferred to NATO and replaced, in the current fiscal year, by United States 90 mm. guns, the figure for cash disbursements for 1951-52 could be reduced by a further $50 million. If $100 million that the army appeared unlikely to be able to spend on equipment in 1951-52 was also deducted, expected cash disbursements for that year would be reduced to about $1.7 billion. This would permit execution of a programme that appeared to be generally recognized as necessary.

43. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, noting that it was proposed to spend something like $100 million on U.S.-type A/A guns with T-33 tracking devices, suggested that, as present Canadian A/A equipment would be almost as effective in keeping aircraft at a high altitude and away from targets, a calculated risk should be taken and current equipment retained so as to effect a reduction in the defence programme.

44. Mr. Claxton said that the range of Canadian 3.7 inch A/A guns was limited and, as they were operated by hand, they were only effective against relatively slow aircraft. In due course there would be available more efficient anti-aircraft rockets with homing devices and these would require the trackers it was proposed to purchase. The military authorities considered it important to have the U.S.-type A/A equipment. Use of Canadian equipment for any length of time by the reserve forces would lead to public criticism of the inadequacy of Canadian anti-aircraft defences.

45. The Minister of Finance suggested that purchase of U.S. anti-aircraft equipment, or some other items, would have to be postponed so as to permit reduction of the defence estimates for 1951-52 to the figure of $1,650 million.

46. The Minister of National Defence pointed out that, some months ago, a programme of modernizing Canadian 3.7 inch A/A guns at an estimated cost of some $75 million had been approved. Subsequently, the army had found that the United States could furnish some 90 mm. guns which were better, required less modernization and would cost about $50,000 a unit. On December 28th, 1950, approval had been given by Cabinet for the purchase of 100 of these guns and for the transfer of 100 Canadian guns to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. Accordingly, arrangements had at once been made with U.S. authorities looking to delivery of 100 90 mm. guns and the 100 Canadian guns had been offered to NATO.

47. Mr. Abbott thought that decisions to proceed with individual defence items should not have a cumulative effect but, rather, that all items should come within a figure agreed as appropriate for the defence programme for a given year, with the defence authorities determining priorities for expenditures within that figure. Under the revised estimates, it was planned to transfer more equipment to NATO in 1950-51 and to defer certain expenditures until 1952-53, but the estimates did not contemplate any reduction in the four-year programme. Deferment of expenditures amounting to $400 million, including $100 million for equipment that the army was not now expected to buy in 1951-52, would be reflected in the estimates for 1952-53. Postponement of the purchase of U.S. A/A guns was suggested and the fact that some aircraft equipment would not be available in 1951-52 should be recognized because it would not be possible to pitch the defence programme too high for that year and calculated risks would have to be taken. A defence programme of $1,650 million for 1951-52 would compare favourably with the defence efforts of all NATO countries except the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

48. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he would like to have the Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee, present to him the case for the purchase of 90 mm. A/A guns before it was decided to include them in the defence programme.

49. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that expenditure of $100 million on strengthening some part of the North Atlantic Treaty area against known dangers would be preferable to devoting it to A/A guns to provide protection against an indeterminate air threat.

50. The Prime Minister felt that a delay in purchasing 90 mm. A/A guns might be regretted in the long run but that, if a homing anti-aircraft rocket were produced, it might so change the character of warfare as to render the U.S. gun useless. He would be prepared to agree to the 90 mm. gun programme should General Foulkes be able to satisfy the Minister of Trade and Commerce on its merits.

51. The Deputy Minister of National Defence reported that, since January 24th, officials of the Departments of Finance and Trade and Commerce had collaborated with his department in reviewing the defence programme and re-assessing its financial requirements. The estimates under consideration, while representing the original four-year programme, contemplated deferment of some expenditures on clothing, housing and construction in general. A/A guns excepted, any major reduction of the total programme could only be effected by a reduction of Canadian commitments to NATO.

52. Mr. Abbott felt that, as the proposed programme would entail a sizeable drain on dollar reserves, a large part of the army equipment to be purchased in the United States might possibly be left in U.S. stocks for the present.

53. Mr. Drury said that only a portion of this army equipment was required for mobilization reserves. Equipment for an equivalent of three divisions was needed immediately for two brigade groups, the balance of the active units, training schools and the reserve forces. If U.S. stocks required were not purchased soon, they would be shipped to Europe, and have to be bought from new production at higher prices. Now that a start had been made on conversion to U.S.-type army equipment, it was, from the technical point of view, important to complete the process as rapidly as possible so as to avoid the confusion that would arise if a war found the army in the midst of conversion.

54. Mr. Howe believed it desirable to purchase in 1951-52 sufficient U.S. army stocks for two divisions.

55. The Prime Minister suggested that, if there were an emergency, the government would want to feel that it was no fault of its own if conversion had not been completed. It therefore appeared desirable to press on with the conversion programme as rapidly as possible.

56. Mr. Abbott did not think that equipment for as many as five divisions should be ordered.

57. Mr. Claxton said that five divisions of equipment would be required by 1954.

58. Mr. Abbott suggested that, as it was now known that it would be impossible, owing to supply difficulties in the United States, to accomplish in 1951-52 some of the aircraft programme originally contemplated, there could be a proportionate reduction in the estimates of expenditures for that year.

59. Mr. Drury pointed out that it was very difficult to estimate expenditures on items required from U.S. sources. There could be some reduction in the estimates of expenditures for the air force in 1951-52 as, with fewer aircraft available, there would be smaller squadrons. He suggested, however, that to defer to 1952-53 expenditures on a significant range of service items would merely increase the burden of defence expenditures in that year, partly because prices would be higher at that time, particularly in the United States.

60. Mr. Abbott said that, as there was always the possibility of an improvement in the situation, he felt that that risk might be run.

With respect to the new headquarters building, he thought that the proposed expenditure of $25 million would provide unnecessarily large accommodation. There might be criticism if any plan of extensive building were announced.

61. Mr. Claxton said that, while the new buildings had been conceived as a long-term project, he thought that it would be useful to have the buildings available in the event of a war.

62. Mr. Drury pointed out that his department was at present occupying 1-1/2 million gross square feet of space. The cost of the proposed building would be $14 per square foot.

63. Mr. St-Laurent said that, while such a building might be desirable, it was a question whether it was possible to have it as well as all the other items required.

64. The Minister of Public Works considered that a decision on these buildings should be made reasonably soon as there would be a space shortage in due course. He suggested, as a desirable solution, proceeding with one unit of the project.

65. Mr. Abbott thought this a reasonable plan. He pointed out that the defence programme proposed would impose an appreciable strain on the economy. On the basis of national income, it would be of the same order as the programme of the United Kingdom, which planned to devote some 10.5 per cent to defence in 1951-52. It would therefore represent a very respectable contribution to the common effort. The whole of the proposed programme could, of course, be accomplished if drastic steps were taken to reduce personal consumption and private investment, but there would be opposition to far-reaching measures of this nature at this time.

He thought that it had been generally agreed that the defence estimates for 1951-52 should be reduced to $1.6 million plus $50 million for the capital assistance to be provided by the new Department of Defence Production, which had been added since the programme was considered in January.

66. Mr. St-Laurent felt it would be unwise for Canada to aim at too large a programme at this stage. It was preferable for this country to keep some potential in reserve as it would be under frequent pressure to make additional contributions. Moreover, he did not wish to have to ask Parliament for any more money than could in fact be spent.

He suggested that there be agreement on a figure of $1,650 million for the defence programme for 1951-52, on the understanding that necessary readjustments to reduce the estimates to that figure would be discussed between the Departments of National Defence, Finance and Trade and Commerce.

67. The Cabinet, after further discussion:

(a) approved the recommendation of the Minister of Finance that cash appropriations for 1951-52 for defence purposes, including housing, civil defence, capital assistance and mutual aid, should total $1,650 million, and that appropriate adjustments should be made to bring the defence programme for 1951-52 within that figure;

(b) approved the physical programme, to be accomplished in four years, that had been recommended by the Minister of National Defence on January 24th, 1951, subject to further consideration being given to the inclusion in that programme of acquisition of United States-type anti-aircraft equipment; a new National Defence Headquarters building; the recruitment of women; the manufacture of F-86 airframes for the North Atlantic Treaty Organization; and to further review of the timing of the Canadian army contribution to the Integrated Force in Europe; and,

(c) agreed that it would be desirable to press on with the conversion of the army from United Kingdom to United States-type equipment as rapidly as possible.

CANADIAN DIVISIONAL EQUIPMENT FOR ITALY

A few minutes ago, I spoke to Drury and said that we were mystified and disturbed to find that General Marras of Italy had sent thank you messages to Mr. Claxton and General Foulkes for a third division's equipment which, Marras was evidently under the impression, had been offered to NATO and allocated by the Standing Group to Italy.

2. Drury explained that Marras was ahead of the game. Apparently the Standing Group had "got hold of" a complete list of available Canadian equipment and had proceeded to discuss and decide to what countries such equipment should go or rather to what countries the Standing Group would recommend that the Canadian Government send it. In this way, the Standing Group had decided to recommend that the third division's equipment should be given to Italy or the Netherlands (the decision between them to be made by the Canadian Government).

3. Drury said that, although authority to offer a third division's equipment had not yet been sought by National Defence, fiscal provision had been made for $50,000,000 which would enable them to dispose of this equipment to NATO and replace it (largely, I assume, from United States sources). National Defence would shortly be recommending that this third division's equipment be offered to NATO through the Deputies and allocated in accordance with the recommendations of the Standing Group.

4. What has happened is that the cart has gone well ahead of the horse — in fact, is at the bottom of the hill with the horse still motionless at the top. National Defence are not very worried about this because they are anxious to get on with the offer and replacement and, now that they have the Standing Group's views in advance, the operation can be conducted much more quickly, provided Cabinet approve.

5. I do not think that there is anything much we can or should do about this. The policy of replacing from the $300,000,000 vote divisional equipment offered to NATO has been established and, although the using up of substantially almost the whole vote in this way is not what we originally expected as "mutual aid", there is a good deal to be said for it and the fact is that the equipment given is good value. If the offer is made on Cabinet approval, I take it that we would be satisfied to have the equipment go to Italy. National Defence are inclined to prefer Italy to the Netherlands, partly at least because the Netherlands' press reaction to the transfer of the first division's equipment has been rather grudging.

DESPATCH 1274 Ottawa, March 13, 1951

CONFIDENTIAL

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID AND CANADIAN DEFENCE PRODUCTION

On March 6 we had the first meeting of the Sub-Panel on the Economic Aspects of Defence (Plumptre, Chairman, Deutsch, Beaupré, R.G. Robertson, and Nolan, National Defence). One of the thoughts which the Main Panel had in mind when it created the Sub-Panel was that a smaller group at the working level could be helpful in clearing interdepartmentally and getting action taken on many of the tangled economic, financial and production problems in the military field which arise daily from every side.

2. The plans for our own defence efforts over the next few years are known. The new Department of Defence Production will soon get underway. With the size of our military programme determined and with the new Department assuming large specific responsibilities it should be possible to bring more clarity to ourselves and to our NATO partners on what Canada's defence production and mutual aid role will be.

3. In the development of a mutual aid programme within our overall programme for defence there are several points to be cleared up and policies to be decided. Some of these are:

(a) The $300 million mutual aid vote — what has happened to it and what remains.

The position as of today for this fiscal year and the prospects for the next fiscal year follow:

Mutual Aid Fiscal Year 1950-51

Cabinet has approved the following transfers to be charged against the mutual aid vote in the fiscal year 1950-51:

Armament and Ammunition for a Division to the Netherlands	$56,750,000
Armament and Ammunition for a Division to Belgium	$56,750,000
100 AA Guns and Ammunition approved by Order-in-Council F.C. 942 dated March 2, 1951	$31,245,000
24-25 pounder guns to Luxembourg approved by Order-in-Council P.C. 797 of February 13, 1951	$672,216
Armament and Ancillary Stores including ammunition with some minor substitutions of particular weapons (probably to Netherlands or Italy)	$50,000,000
TOTAL	$195,417,216

This year the mutual aid monies have been supervised by the Department of Trade and Commerce. As National Defence makes the $195,000,000 of equipment available to mutual aid, monies from the $300 million vote are paid over to National Defence and placed in a suspense account. The suspense account fund will be used to pay for United States type equipment as it is received either from the United States or from Canadian production. In the next fiscal year it is planned to put the remaining mutual aid money into the estimates of National Defence to be used as explained below.

Mutual Aid Fiscal Year 1951-52

Provision has been made in Department of National Defence estimates for $165,965,892 to be charged as mutual aid during the fiscal year 1951-52. This figure was made up of the items listed below. It should be emphasized that apart from the air training scheme and the 300 No. 4 Mark VI Radar sets these are not firm commitments.

NATO aircrew training in Canada		$55,806,164
Direct Aid Items
(amount expected to be charged this year is given; charged for future years given in brackets)
	(Future Years)
300 radar sets	($15,000,000)	$25,000,000
Artillery	($ 6,500,000)	$ 2,500,000
Walkie Talkies	($ 8,220,000)	$ 5,480,000
Anti-Aircraft Guns, Signals and Balance of Field Equipment		$77,179,728
	TOTAL	$165,965,892

This figure of $165,965,892 is made up of $61,483,108 "new money" for 1951-52 plus $104,582,784 which is the residue of the $300 millions re-voted from 1950-51.

(b) New Canadian defence production — sales to customers or gifts to partners.

Important policy questions in this field have not yet been tackled. The pattern of using mutual aid funds to cover

(i) the transfer of existing military stocks, and

(ii) NATO training in Canada has been established. When it comes to new production, careful consideration has to be given to financial and economic questions which do not arise in the same degree when existing stocks are transferred or training facilities in Canada are provided. Until these questions are resolved we do not want the impression to grow amongst our European partners in NATO that Canadian defence production is going to turn into a give-away programme. This could be misleading and a source of embarrassment in trying to set right.

Considerations in mind are not simply the difference in direct cost to the Canadian treasury between a gift and a sale. There is also the consideration that the results for NATO as a whole may often have more relation to genuine needs if price tags are attached. Viewing NATO as a whole, a cost clearly falls at some point in terms of materials and manpower for all items produced, but if some are thought of as "free" by recipient countries there may be a distortion of programmes away from what a strict regard for relative essentiality would indicate.

When our mutual aid programme was undertaken it was understood that we would be making available equipment for two divisions. The doubling of this figure has made a major change in the availability of the $300 million for financing new defence production under mutual aid. Moreover, there is no longer the same incentive to use the mutual aid vote for "pump-priming" defence production. The expanded Canadian defence programme has made pump-priming academic in most fields.

4. The method of presenting our mutual aid operations used in para 3(a) does not show the actual physical and financial impact on our economy. It is an accounting presentation and not one which shows the period in which the real burden will fall. Most of the impact which one would assume from looking at the figures would occur in 1950-51 will not in fact arise until 1951-52. Existing stocks have been shipped but only some $4 million have been actually spent on replacements. The presentation of what might be called our "Military Balance of Payments" in the forthcoming Burden-Sharing studies will bring this point out clearly.

SECRET Rome, March 10, 1951

Dear Mr. Pearson,

Yesterday afternoon, Count Zoppi, the Secretary General of the Foreign Ministry, who I met by chance, told me that he had received word from the Italian Embassy in Ottawa that the arms and equipment for one division had been assigned to Italy by Canada. He made no reference to the misunderstanding a week ago about this matter. I replied that so far [as] I knew the news was premature.

I fully realize that it is not possible for the Department to keep Missions informed of the detailed negotiations which are taking place in Washington about these matters. It is perhaps also reasonable to expect that recommendations of the Standing Group affecting the allocation of Canadian arms will be known to the governments concerned before the Canadian missions are informed. But I am sure you will agree that decisions of the Canadian Government on such recommendations should not be first brought to the attention of the Canadian representatives in the countries concerned either by the governments to which they are accredited or through the press.[7] If Count Zoppi's information in this particular instance was premature, I hope that the Department will let me know at once when a decision is reached.

For other and more substantial reasons I hope that the information in this case was premature.

As you know, the implementation of the agreement on civilian relief and the release of Italian assets in Canada have both been held up by failure to reach agreement on the question of Canadian claims for war damage.[8] It has always been the view of the Canadian negotiators that a lump-sum settlement of these claims would be very much more satisfactory than bargaining over each individual claim and resort to conciliation. The Italians have not rejected the principle of such a settlement; they have merely been unwilling to make an offer which bore any reasonable relationship to the size of our valid claims. I have been pressing them for ten weeks so far without success, for a reply to our latest proposal, which is for a sum approximately equivalent to one and a quarter million dollars.

If the Government is disposed to give to the Italians military equipment to the value of more than fifty million dollars, would it not be possible to delay the announcement for a few weeks in the hope that they will be encouraged to put an end to their delaying tactics over these questions arising out of the last war?[9] It seems to me that a final settlement of all such questions between the two countries, together with the allocation of this equipment, which is eagerly anticipated, would place Canadian-Italian relations on an entirely new footing.[10]

Yours sincerely,

JEAN DÉSY

CONFIDENTIAL Ottawa, March 20, 1951

Dear Mr. Wilgress:

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID

By now you should have received Despatch No. E.1274 of March 13 giving the present position of Canadian mutual aid and outlining some of the problems concerning the future of Canadian mutual aid. As far as the future of mutual aid is concerned, you may have gathered the impression that the problems bulk larger than the programme. I thought it would be useful, therefore, to let you know for your own information something of our thinking in the Department on this question.

2. No one knew precisely how Canada's mutual aid programme would develop when it was announced last summer. However, I think it is fair to say that none of us would have expected so much of the $300 million to be used in covering the transfer of existing military stocks. Most of us expected a larger part to be used for financing new defence production. I do not want to under-estimate the importance and reality of the contribution which Canada has made to date in transferring good equipment for two divisions; I only wish to emphasize that the mutual aid vote was originally expected to play a large role in transferring newly produced supplies to other countries and in priming the pump for production of such supplies.

3. The giving away of existing stocks will soon be coming to an end and we will be faced with the problem of determining the future of mutual aid, and how it should be tied into the greatly expanded defence production in Canada. For sound political reasons, which you are well aware of, this Department is concerned in seeing that Canada's mutual aid programme is respectable. However, I think it is not an opportune time to raise interdepartmentally the broad outlines of a mutual aid programme over the next three years.

4. Our hesitation to take initiative at the present time can be summarized under three points:

(1) International production planning is still confused. There has been no counterpart yet in defence production planning to the NATO military planning which made it possible to draw up clear plans for our armed services over the next three years.

(2) Our own organization to handle production is just coming into being. Production men are arriving daily at No. 3 Temporary to take up their tasks in the new Department. Mr. H.R. MacMillan's survey of the production programmes in Europe and here may be helpful in generating greater interest in certain quarters in getting Canada to assume a mutual aid role comparable in firmness and zest, although not in size, to our role ten years ago. The initiative in drawing up a mutual aid programme for production items must, I think, lie with the Department of Defence Production.

(3) With the 1951-52 estimates tabled in Parliament only a few days ago and the Department of Finance struggling with the budget, the atmosphere is not propitious for broaching a long range mutual aid programme which may entail additional commitments for future years and possibly for this year. In a couple of months the picture may well be different and I hope it will be possible to give this important question the attention it deserves.

5. I should be grateful for any suggestions you may wish to make.

Yours sincerely,

A.D.P. HEENEY

Projet d'une lettre de l'adjoint exécutif du sous-ministre du Commerce au conseiller du haut-commissariat au Royaume-Uni

Draft Letter from Executive Assistant to Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to Counsellor, High Commission in United Kingdom

PERSONAL AND SECRET [Ottawa, March 20, 1951]

Dear Evan [Gill]:

With so many current developments in the NATO production field and with our own involvement and interest increasing daily as the birth of a new Department of Defence Production approaches, I thought the time might be appropriate to drop you a personal note to explain some of our problems at this end.

It may be that, viewed from the distance of London, and having heard now for some time about impending developments in the Canadian industrial mobilization field, you have gained the impression that the machinery exists for giving full and early consideration to the production aspects of projected offers of Canadian goods to NATO countries.

Such is not quite the case, however, and the stage reached now is merely one of welcoming daily into this Department production experts in the various fields of military interest. Until these men have had a chance to take off their hats and coats and to consider the problems, it seems unwise for the non-experts to make far reaching decisions regarding new production in Canada.

The pressure of events has been such that piecemeal commitments, both firm and contemplated, against our mutual aid vote have far outstripped the $300 million appropriation. As a consequence, very careful consideration will have to be given to the financial implications of any new offers to NATO. A great deal of thought is currently being devoted to this problem but decisions cannot be reached overnight.

An illustration of some of these problems, although with some special angles involved, is the 45,000 one-mile portable radio sets. Technical experts of the

A.B.C. group are working towards standardization, and indications are that this will result in large scale manufacture being initiated simultaneously in all three countries. According to your advice, the Netherlands are interested in manufacture and there may be others. As a consequence, some people are beginning to wonder whether any high purpose is going to be served by our offering to mutual aid these sets to NATO. (This does not alter the fact of course that one of our prime purposes, that of establishing industrial capacity in the sub miniature electronic components field will have been achieved.) Under these circumstances, it would seem prudent to go slow on this one until we've had time for full consideration at this end.

It would be helpful to us if the pressure to put forth new Canadian offers could be eased a little during the present transitionary period, when new personalities are arriving on the scene and when areas of responsibility are being defined. This does not detract in any manner from the job which is currently being done for Canada on the Defence Production Board of NATO. Furthermore, we are very cognizant of the fact that you in London are sitting in the hot seat when it comes to answering for Canada's part in the international effort.

I thought, however, that by dropping you this personal note, it might help to put you in the picture regarding the present atmosphere and thinking in Ottawa. It may well be that a little time gained now, which will enable more thorough consideration of the problems, will result in Canada's industrial contribution to North Atlantic defence being more effective in the long run.[11]

With kindest personal regards,
Sincerely,
T.N. BEAUPRÉ

Dear Mr. Désy,

In Mr. Pearson's absence I am answering your letter of March 10 regarding the shipment of arms and equipment to Italy.

You suggest that this shipment might be held up pending further discussion with the Italian Government regarding the settlement of outstanding Canadian claims for war damages. It was not, however, feasible to do so. In announcing to the Council Deputies and the Standing Group that equipment for a third infantry division was available we had attached no condition except that arrangements for replacement would have to be made before the equipment would be released. After the Standing Group had recommended that the equipment go to Italy we could not, therefore, very well bring pressure on Italy to settle before releasing the equipment. However, in later discussions with the Italian Government for the settlement of war claims it may be useful to remind them of the military equipment we are giving them.

I. FUTURE CANADIAN POLICY REGARDING MUTUAL AID

1. The Deputy Minister of Defence Production said that the Sub-Panel had prepared a memorandum designed to place before Cabinet the question of future policy with regard to Canadian mutual aid. A Cabinet decision would in turn permit instructions to be given to Mr. H.R. MacMillan, who was about to take up his duties as Canadian member of the NATO Defence Production Board. The memorandum made the following main points:

(1) The $300 million appropriated under Section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and the $61.3 million for similar purposes in the Defence estimates for 1951-52, were fully committed as follows:

1950-51
Transfers of Army equipment to NATO —	$195.4 million
1951-52
NATO aircrew training —	55.8 million
Aid from new production —	32.9 million
Transfers of remaining Army equipment to NATO —	77.2 million
	$361.3 million

(2) An additional $81 million would be required if the F-86 airframe programme for NATO were proceeded with and further appropriations would in any case be needed after 1951-52 to complete the financing of NATO aircrew training and of already approved aid from new production.

(3) Contrary to original expectations, Canadian aid had consisted predominantly of transfers of U.K.-type equipment.

(4) In connection with any D.P.B. suggestions for additional aid from production, it would have to be borne in mind that Canadian industry was relatively fully employed, manpower problems were increasing, basic materials were very short, and Canada's production should be concentrated on types of equipment used by its forces. It should be made clear that stocks of replacement parts for U.K.-type equipment transferred to NATO would not be generally available in Canada, and that standby production facilities in Canada for U.K.-type equipment was not planned.

(5) The policy for the future that it appeared desirable to recommend to Cabinet was that, should the D.P.B. propose additional Canadian aid from production, it should be informed that (a) the impact of the 1951-52 programme would be such that additional Canadian aid in that year was very unlikely; (b) Canada would consider proposals for additional aid if deliveries and major costs would not occur until 1952-53 — assuming a government decision now to provide the necessary funds in that year; and (c) the government would assist NATO countries in purchasing military equipment in Canada.

(6) While the possibility of Canadian purchases in Europe should not be precluded, Canadian standardization on U.S.-type equipment meant that Canada's main interest in European production was the procurement of specialized production equipment.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Sub-Panel memorandum, "Canadian participation in the NATO Defence Production Programme" — Panel Document ED-36)†

2. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada suggested that, since the defence programme involved purchases in the United States totalling possibly $300 million in two years, and as these purchases would consist mainly of Army equipment required because of the transfers of U.K.-type equipment to NATO, reciprocal aid by those countries appeared desirable.

3. Mr. Mackenzie thought that the U.S. dollar content of the defence programme was not too serious a matter as the United States was placing significant compensating orders in Canada and would be spending sizeable sums in connection with U.S. military installations in Canada.

4. Mr. Deutsch said that a recent study indicated that the U.S. dollar content of the defence programme in the calendar year 1951 would be $225-$250 million. As regards the balance of payments position, Canada's deficit overall on current account had been $300 million for 1950 and was expected to rise to $479 million for 1951. Defence purchases in the United States were the main factor contributing to this rise. Other important factors were higher U.S. prices and the U.S. dollar drain represented by Canadian tourist travel.

5. Mr. Coyne wondered whether, if the remaining transfers of Army equipment to NATO were not carried out, replacement expenses in the United States could be cut. From an exchange point of view it was, of course, preferable for Canada to purchase defence equipment in the United Kingdom.

6. The Deputy Minister of National Defence explained that conversion of the whole Army to U.S.-type equipment represented government policy. Also, a large part of the Army equipment had already been transferred, and it was not feasible to consider operating half the Army on U.S. and half on U.K.-type equipment.

7. The Chairman thought that, as and when Western Europe began to produce U.S.-type equipment, Canada should consider placing some orders there for its forces. Western European progress in getting into production of such equipment was slow largely because of a lack of firm orders.

8. Mr. Drury pointed out the Sub-Panel's comment on this question (para. 8), as outlined in para. 1(6) above. He added that, for some time at least, Europe's output of U.S.-type equipment would be inadequate for its own needs; Europe would not be producing the really expensive items, such as tanks; and, while the U.K. Canberra bomber and Venom fighter had now been accepted as standard, bombers were not required by Canada at present and the Venom was very similar to the F-86 being produced in Canada.

9. Mr. Mackenzie said that Europe would not be able to produce many of Canada's requirements soon enough.

10. Mr. Drury said — on the question of whether, under the Army conversion programme, it was necessary to maintain mobilization reserves of U.S.-type equipment on the scale of the reserves now being transferred to NATO — that in the next two years it was only hoped to obtain U.S.-type equipment for the Active Force, Reserve Force training and mobilization reserves for two divisions. There would thus be smaller reserves than had been held prior to the transfer of equipment to NATO.

11. Mr. Robertson said that what had happened and what would have to be made clearer to Cabinet was that, under the provisions of Section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, Canada had been carrying out what was primarily a major programme of conversion of its own army component, rather than one of aid to NATO countries. As the Sub-Panel's list of aid commitments showed, this process was nearly at an end and it was now a question of what sort of aid programme Canada might embark upon. In the summer of 1950 it had been thought that Canada could make its best contribution to NATO by increasing its productive capacity, rather than by raising substantial military forces. A new position had now been reached, however, since Canada had been committed to a pretty sizeable military programme for itself and its defence production programme was geared to this military programme.

12. The Deputy Minister of Finance thought that, as expenditures on some items in the defence programme were being deferred to 1952-53, and total expenditures on the programme would therefore be higher in that year, it was doubtful that, as suggested in para. 7(b) of the Sub-Panel's paper, it would be feasible for the government to undertake at this stage to consider additional production expenditures on behalf of NATO in 1952-53.

13. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that this would mean that Mr. MacMillan would have to tell his European colleagues on the D.P.B. that they must in future pay for all their additional requirements from Canada.

14. Mr. Coyne suggested that, as the United States appeared more likely to make "off-shore" purchases than purchases for its own forces, in Canada, it would be undesirable for Mr. MacMillan to take too firmly the line, suggested in para. 6(a) of the Sub-Panel's memorandum, that Canadian industry is now fully employed.

15. Mr. Drury said that the United States was very unlikely to make appreciable "off-shore" military purchases in Canada unless it was satisfied that Canada was carrying its full share of aid to Europe.

16. The Chairman, Defence Research Board pointed out that it would be unnecessary to indicate to NATO countries, as suggested in para. 7(a) of the Sub-Panel's paper, that additional Canadian production aid in 1951-52 was unlikely. If NATO orders were placed now, they would not have an appreciable impact until 1952-53.

17. Mr. Robertson suggested that para. 6 of the Sub-Panel's memorandum should include an additional sub-paragraph pointing out Canada's increasing U.S. dollar difficulties.

18. Mr. Coyne suggested that para. 6 begin with two points: (a) the Canadian aid programme for 1951-52 is now fixed; (b) there will be further charges in 1952-53 (air training and completion of approved production aid) and additional production aid will be affected by the exchange position.

19. Mr. Robertson thought that it would be undesirable either to refuse all additional production or to ask for a fixed sum now for such aid. It should be explained to Cabinet that, so far, Canadian "aid" had, for the most part, really been Army conversion. It might be asked to approve a general policy of extending additional production aid where NATO orders happened to fit in with Canadian production plans. It might also be suggested that, in suitable cases, a pricing formula, like that proposed at the last meeting, could be applied to such orders and that, in other cases, such as F-86 airframe production for the United Kingdom, triangular arrangements could apply.

20. Mr. Drury said that it was important to decide what should be produced for the Canadian forces as a basis for consideration of D.P.B. suggestions of additional production aid.

21. Mr. Beaupré pointed out that, in NATO, the emphasis had been on making the maximum use of Western European production facilities.

22. Mr. Robertson, referring to para. 6(c) of the Sub-Panel's paper, said that as a general policy it seemed sensible for Canada to concentrate on U.S.-type production, but that there appeared to be arguments for the strategic dispersal of capacity to produce U.K.-type equipment, against the possibility of Western Europe's factories suffering more than its forces in a war.

23. Dr. Solandt pointed out that equipment made in Canada for the Canadian forces was not be any means in all cases usable by forces of other countries which had the same types of equipment made elsewhere than in Canada.

24. The Panel, after further discussion, noted the Sub-Panel's draft memorandum to Cabinet on the future of mutual aid and agreed that the Sub-Panel revise it, in the light of the discussion, for consideration by the Panel at 2:30 p.m. on Tuesday, April 10th.

II. RECIPROCAL MUTUAL AID

25. Mr. Deutsch said that the question of reciprocal mutual aid had been discussed in a preliminary way in the Sub-Panel and that a revised paper on the subject had then been prepared in the Department of External Affairs.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(External Affairs memorandum, "Reciprocal Mutual Aid", April 6, 1951 — Panel Document ED-37)†

He distinguished two problems for the consideration of the Panel:

(a) the policy question of whether the Canadian Government would wish to accept the principle of receiving reciprocal mutual aid in certain cases; and,

(b) the procedural question as to how, if the Government agreed in principle, such a programme would be operated.

26. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada spoke in favour of reciprocal mutual aid on the grounds of Canada's foreign exchange position. Also, he thought that this factor affected Canada's direct mutual aid programme, as it might be better policy to do more for NATO in Canada (e.g., air training) than to undertake assistance in forms that put a direct burden on Canada's foreign exchange position.

27. The Deputy Minister of Finance agreed that the foreign exchange position was becoming an important factor in so far as Canadian dealings with the United States were concerned, but he did not believe that the Canadian foreign exchange position was likely to become serious vis-à-vis Europe, where the reciprocal mutual aid programme would operate.

28. The Deputy Minister of Defence Production thought that reciprocal mutual aid made sense if it meant trading "like for like", i.e., expanding R.A.F. training in Canada at Canadian expense in return for the U.K. Government accepting maintenance and training charges for Canadian squadrons posted in the United Kingdom.

He did not, however, believe that goods should be offset against services, as had been proposed in the case of the request to the United Kingdom for Bailey bridges.

29. The Deputy Minister of National Defence remarked that there would, of course, be no question of Canada making a profit from any country on a reciprocal programme; that it would be applied only as an offset to countries receiving mutual aid from Canada; and that, apart from the United Kingdom, it seemed likely that there would be no offsets with the exception of small service charges that might be applied in France and Belgium.

30. Mr. MacKay added that he understood that most of the expenses of Canadian forces would be incurred in Western Germany and that it would not be possible to apply a reciprocal programme there.

He thought there were two principal points of policy to consider:

(a) It might be embarrassing and even invidious for the Canadian Government to ask countries to whom it had given mutual aid without strings, whether they would be prepared to reciprocate, especially if they were asked to do so retroactively. Announcements of the Canadian mutual aid programme by government spokesmen had been made in Ottawa and in NATO agencies, emphasizing the NATO character of our programme. It would be difficult to go back, now, on a bilateral basis, to certain governments with the proposal that certain offsetting charges should be taken into account.

(b) The Canadian Government would be under pressure to make greater defence efforts and every offsetting charge would decrease the net amount of Canadian defence spending (if mutual aid is included) at a time when it might be more practical for the Canadian Government to raise dollars (even U.S. dollars) than men.

31. Mr. Deutsch thought Canada should pay its way, as it had been doing with the United States, and retain complete freedom to decide for itself what and when it might give to other countries as mutual aid, without the complication of cumbering itself with offsetting charges which might lead directly to requests for more aid.

32. The Chairman thought that, in any case, reciprocal mutual aid should not be required as an offset charge against Canadian transfers of equipment from military stocks. If a policy of reciprocal mutual aid were to be adopted, he thought that it should be applied in such fields as air training.

33. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed that it would be necessary to discuss the question of reciprocal mutual aid again at the next meeting of the Panel before recommendations for the government could be satisfactorily formulated.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL London, April 7, 1951

Dear Mr. Heeney:

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID

I thank you for your personal and confidential letter of March 20th, and greatly appreciate your further explanation of the situation pertaining to Canadian mutual aid which was outlined in despatch No. E.1274 of March 13th.

I can quite appreciate that under present circumstances the Department of External Affairs cannot very well take the initiative in pressing for further consideration of the problems relating to Canadian mutual aid. It is certainly a disappointment to find that, with a ceiling set on defence expenditures in this fiscal year of $1,600 million, no provision has been made for an additional amount to cover the possible transfer free of charge of end items of military equipment not already more or less committed.

We have been taking here as a basis of Canadian Government policy the statement which I was authorized to submit to the North Atlantic Council Deputies on August 24th last, the last paragraph of which contained the following sentence:

> "Within the limits of the appropriations approved by Parliament, the Canadian Government would transfer to a European member of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization that share of the Canadian production allocated to that country on the basis that the Canadian Government would bear the cost of the Canadian content entering into the end-product and the other North Atlantic Governments would bear the cost of the content contributed by their countries to the production of the end-product."[12]

We further assumed that the special appropriation of $300 million was for the purpose of pump priming, and that when that appropriation was exhausted a further amount would be appropriated for the same purpose. The lack of any further appropriation (apart from the extra $61 million already accounted for) is what is now giving us concern.

It is true no one expected that so large a proportion of the $300 million would be used for the transfer of existing military stocks. As you point out in your letter, the giving away of existing stocks will soon be coming to an end and if there is no provision for mutual aid in the form of end items from new production, there will be to all intents and purposes a falling off in Canadian mutual aid at the very time when our partners in NATO might be expecting us to increase our efforts in this connection. They will be left with the unfortunate impression that our mutual aid offer was actuated by the desire to find a means of disposing of equipment we no longer wanted.

In this connection, I think it most important, in determining our attitude towards further mutual aid, to maintain a distinction between:

(a) the cost of re-equipping our own forces with United States type equipment; and

(b) the value of the United Kingdom type equipment released to the European NAT countries.

The re-equipment of our own forces is only partly due to the fact that some of our United Kingdom type equipment is being given to others. It is also due, however, to a deliberate policy decision to standardize on United States types. Isn't it somewhat unfair, therefore, to attribute the bulk of the cost to mutual aid? Clearly the cost of replacement has to be covered somewhere in our defence estimates (as part of our defence effort), at the price of the comparable United States types with which we are in fact re-equipping, but those figures surely do not give a true measure of the extent of our mutual aid.

While the European countries have been most grateful for our assistance so far (as re-emphasized in the April 4th radio speeches of van Zeeland, Drees and Stikker), I wonder whether they, or the United States, would accept such figures as representing our contribution to mutual aid. While we do not have all the details on which to calculate the value of this equipment to the recipients, we would think that on the basis of United States and United Kingdom precedents (where the original value of the equipment has normally been discounted considerably) they would regard the value of this aid as very substantially less than the cost of United States type replacements.

Even if one takes ordinary United Kingdom divisional prices (adjusted for the absence of vehicles from our equipment), the figures are only a fraction of the amounts indicated in the Ottawa tables. Very roughly, we would calculate that the benefit to the recipients of all our mutual aid so far programmed (excluding the air training scheme) would normally be regarded as less than $100 million.

I can see from your letter that you appreciate fully the sound political reasons for the continuation of the mutual aid programme and for it being of respectable size. We must, of course, avoid the impression that our efforts in NATO are being concentrated on furnishing equipment to be used at the risk of the lives of others than Canadians. At the same time we have a problem in Canada regarding the provision of manpower for the active forces. One way to see that this problem does not react against our international position is to have our other partners in NATO appreciative of the assistance we are rendering them in other directions.

We have definitely indicated to our NATO partners that we are prepared to furnish them with end items of military equipment under mutual aid. So far the greater part of our mutual aid has taken the form of the transfer of existing stocks of military equipment or in air training facilities. If, when the transfer of existing stocks comes to an end, there is no large flow of end items of military equipment to take its place, we shall have one less mitigating factor to be offset against our inability to recruit as much manpower for the armed services as countries with national service. Furthermore, about that time the results of the burden-sharing exercise will have become known. If there appears to be a falling off in the flow of mutual aid from Canada to Europe, we may be faced with embarrassing proposals for the provision of funds to enable the European member countries to purchase from Canada raw materials and such end items of military equipment as they must buy in Canada.

It may be that there is a feeling in Ottawa that the European countries are besieging us with requests for equipment free of charge. This is most certainly not the case, since, except possibly for the United Kingdom suggestion that we supply F-86 aircraft, no European country has specifically come forward with a request for Canadian equipment. All the commitments which have been made so far have been either the result of Canadian offers from existing stocks or action taken on the recommendation of an End Item Task Force, an exercise due largely to Canadian initiative.

Another possible misapprehension, in which I think the Department shares, is that we can get a great deal of help from NATO in planning what we should produce for our partners in the Organization. For instance, in paragraph 4 (1) of your letter, you state that there has been no counterpart yet in defence production planning to the NATO military planning. This is certainly so, and the reasons for it are not hard to find. Firstly, it was necessary for countries to develop military plans before their requirements of military equipment could be determined. This has now been done, and plans to equip the national forces to be raised under the medium term plan can now be tackled with vigour. The Defence Production Board, however, has taken the stand that the major responsibility for production programmes must necessarily rest with the countries themselves and that the role of the Board is limited to coordinating national plans in the general NATO interest, to helping countries overcome difficulties in implementing their programmes, etc., etc.

So far as we can see, the Defence Production Board is likely to concentrate its efforts on increasing production in the continental European countries of NATO. The United States and the United Kingdom certainly are not looking to the Board for very much help or guidance in their production planning. Although our position is different, I doubt whether much guidance will be forthcoming for us. I do not think, therefore, you should expect too much from what Mr. MacMillan will be able to accomplish in this field. Our opportunities for coordinating production are mainly with the United States and, to a much more limited extent, with the United Kingdom.

In view of this, I think we must not rely too much on NATO to help us plan our defence production. Our best course is to plan our defence production programmes based on the requirements of our own services, orders from the United States, and perhaps in a few special categories orders from the United Kingdom. Whenever we are in a good position to supply NATO deficiencies, we should add to these firm orders additional quantities to be furnished to other NATO countries as mutual aid, and in this way reduce the over-all unit cost of the equipment. This we should do on our own initiative.

We must clearly realize once and for all that there are no prospects whatsoever of effecting commercial sales of military equipment to any of the European member countries of NATO, except possibly on a very limited scale to the United Kingdom. The balance of payments position of all these countries is such that they simply could not afford (from their own financial resources) to place commercial orders for military equipment in Canada. As you know, they are having enough difficulty in buying even our traditional civilian exports. Any insistence on our part would simply result in pressure through the Financial and Economic Board for the provision of funds to enable such equipment to be purchased (if no provision for the supply of such equipment under mutual aid is available). This would even apply to the United Kingdom if we were to look to the sale of any large quantity of military equipment to this country.

Since production for the European member countries of NATO is for all practical purposes a "give-away" programme, this should be recognized and mutual aid should be regarded as an inherent part of our defence production planning. This is what I understood to be the policy laid down in the statement which I was authorized to submit to the Deputies on August 24th last, and I sincerely trust that there will be no reversal of this policy. I am looking forward to the visit of Mr. C.S.A. Ritchie next week because this will give me the opportunity of discussing these problems fully with him and learning more about the situation in Ottawa. In the meantime I am very grateful to you for your letter.[13]

Yours sincerely,

I. FUTURE POLICY REGARDING CANADIAN MUTUAL AID

1. The Chairman said that, as a result of the discussion of future policy regarding Canadian mutual aid at the meeting on April 6th, a revised draft memorandum to Cabinet Defence Committee had been prepared.

A document was circulated.

(Draft memorandum, April 10, 1951 — "Future Policy regarding Canadian Mutual Aid")†

2. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada said that, while para. 6 of the memorandum might indicate that industry was fairly fully employed and that there were industrial manpower and shortages of basic materials, it should not give the impression that Canada would not undertake additional production for United States dollars. He also thought that para. 10(a) should bring out the fact that the foreign exchange impact of the defence programme was an important factor limiting further expansion of the defence programme (including mutual aid) in 1951-52.

3. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs recalled that, in accordance with government policy, several clear indications had been given since the summer of 1950 that Canada planned to make important contributions to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization from its productive capacity. It would therefore come as a shock to NATO if it had to be informed that Canada could not make good its offers because it had spent most of its mutual aid funds on conversion of its army equipment and that it might have to attach a price to additional aid. He wondered whether the Canadian economy could not stand the expenditure of an additional $300 million on mutual aid.

4. Mr. Plumptre said that the position was that the government considered that it could not go beyond the defence expenditures presently authorized for 1951-52 without introducing extensive controls. This did not mean that it was not possible, in economic terms, to spend an additional $300 million in Canada on mutual aid.

5. Mr. Robertson suggested that, since the matter was already under discussion with the United States and the United Kingdom, the memorandum be amended so that Canadian representatives in NATO bodies would not be asked to resist proposals for Canadian production of F-86 airframes for the United Kingdom in 1951-52.

6. The Deputy Minister of National Defence said that, should the government decide to make these airframes for NATO, they could probably be financed temporarily by postponing the conversion of some of the army equipment.

7. The Panel, after further discussion, approved the draft memorandum to the Cabinet Defence Committee on future policy regarding Canadian mutual aid, subject to the foregoing comments and certain other minor changes.

II. "RECIPROCAL" MUTUAL AID

8. Mr. Plumptre said that, in consequence of the discussion at the meeting on April 6th, he had prepared, as a basis for discussion, a rough draft of principles regarding reciprocal mutual aid that might be recommended to Cabinet Defence Committee. These principles were:

(1) Generally, Canada should pay for all equipment, services, etc., required for its forces from other countries, and continue to refuse to accept lend-lease or mutual aid;

(2) Any exceptions to this policy should not put Canada in the position of a net recipient of mutual aid from any country — least of all the United States;

(3) The following rules might be adopted:

(a) unless Cabinet established broad classes of transactions in which reciprocity would be acceptable, every proposal for reciprocity should be considered interdepartmentally at the official level and submitted to Cabinet;

(b) all reciprocal mutual aid accepted should be of an "offsetting" character, i.e. (i) like services should be set off against each other, (ii) the same country should be involved in the aid and the reciprocity and (iii) the reciprocity should normally be less than the aid in each fiscal year;

(c) it should be for Cabinet to decide in each case how the financial benefits of reciprocity would be allocated;

(d) reciprocity should not be "retroactive".

(4) These rules should not prevent the Canadian forces from exchanging with others small quantities of equipment of approximately equal value.

A document was circulated.

(Mr. Plumptre's memorandum, April 10, 1951, "Reciprocal Mutual Aid")†

9. The Deputy Minister of Finance expressed opposition to the idea of any reciprocal mutual aid. He thought that Canada should continue to decide on general grounds what aid it was going to give and avoid involvement in reciprocal transactions which were bound to be nebulous. Some of his objections to reciprocity were that its incidence as between other NATO countries would be accidental, depending, for instance, on where Canadian forces happened to be stationed; as Canadian aid benefitted the whole NATO area, it was impossible to say which countries should reciprocate and any attempt to do so would lead to controversies which would not be worth the very small amounts of reciprocity that would be available from Europe; the reasonableness of a reciprocal transaction would not remain constant — R.C.A.F. squadrons might be multiplied in the United Kingdom and then moved to the continent; under reciprocal arrangements Canadian units in other NATO countries might be inclined to obtain from the local authorities more facilities than they really required; and, from the point of view of balance of payments, reciprocity would only be significant if it were applied to the United States, but this was not possible as the government had consistently refused to accept lend-lease from the United States.

10. The Chairman, Chiefs of Staff Committee said that he was opposed to reciprocity in the case of the United States. Arrangements were being made for the U.S. Army and the U.S.A.F. to meet certain Canadian Army and Air Force expenses in Germany, on a reimbursable basis. There was no question at present of reciprocity by Germany.

11. The Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada thought it wrong that Canada be in the position of paying U.S. dollars to maintain troops in Germany.

12. The Chairman thought that it would be unwise to recommend to Ministers the first and second principles in the draft memorandum. If the first were carried to its logical conclusion and the United States were expected to furnish all its own military requirements in Canada, without any Canadian participation or control in connection with its projets, there would be objections on sovereignty grounds. Again, by providing certain military installations in Canada, the United States was in effect giving mutual aid, since some of these installations served the defence of Canada as well as of the United States. Thus, to accept the principle that Canada should refuse all mutual aid would mean that it should provide all military installations required in Canada, which would be a heavy additional burden. Finally, as the United States was operating or contributing to a number of installations in this country, Canada was perhaps already in the position of a net recipient of mutual aid in so far as the United States was concerned.

The government would find it helpful, from the point of view of public opinion, to be able to show that there was some reciprocity by NATO countries. It would therefore be unwise to insist that Canada "pay rent for the trenches" in Europe.

13. The Deputy Minister of National Defence thought it was possible to argue that installations that the United States was now establishing in Canada were not an exception to the policy of refusing lend-lease since they were projects which the United States had been permitted to carry out at its own request.

The proposed rules might include the proviso that an offsetting service must be clearly for the benefit of the country suggesting reciprocity.

Statistical comparisons of the estimated financial and economic burdens of the NATO countries were under preparation and, if Canada accepted reciprocal aid, its relative position in the general picture would be poorer, and it would be in a weaker position to resist proposals for increased defence efforts.

The three R.C.A.F. squadrons which were to be in the United Kingdom and whose expenses it was proposed to offset against Canada's expenses in training R.A.F. aircrew, would be serving the defence of the United Kingdom, rather than Western Europe in general, and this question of reciprocity could therefore be separated from the general question of reciprocity for Canadian aid to NATO.

14. The Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs wondered if it would not be preferable to deal with the R.C.A.F.—R.A.F. case by itself. A policy of reciprocity or offsetting charges was not likely to amount to much, and he therefore doubted the need for placing the question of policy before Ministers at this stage.

15. Mr. Deutsch said that the proposal to submit the general question to Cabinet Defence Committee had arisen from a request to the Panel by the Minister of National Defence for recommendations on the subject, and from the fact that it appeared desirable to have agreement on general principles before individual cases were settled.

16. The Panel, after further discussion, agreed that the Sub-Panel should prepare a memorandum for Cabinet Defence Committee on the question of reciprocal mutual aid, taking into account the foregoing comments, explaining the pros and cons of a policy of accepting reciprocity and requesting guidance in the matter.

CANADIAN ARMY AND AIR FORCE CONTRIBUTIONS TO WESTERN EUROPE AND KOREA

3. The Minister of National Defence, referring to discussion at the meeting of April 10th, 1951, said that there was no undertaking as to when Canada would discharge the commitment to provide a brigade group (1/3 of a division) to the Integrated Force by July, 1954, although some indications had been given that this formation would be made available in 1951.

To fulfill the army programme submitted at the meeting on January 24th, 1951, (including a brigade group for Europe but only a battalion of 1,000 men in Korea) and also to maintain a full brigade group in Korea would require a further increase of approximately 10,000 men. During the first quarter of 1951 there had been a net increase of just over 2,100. It was hoped that something like this rate could be maintained and that, apart from this, a special appeal would raise several thousand additional men.

Should it be decided to send a brigade group to Europe, the aim should be to provide, in October or November, 1951, a group of about 6,000 officers and men, including a minimum of administrative and supply personnel, ready for advanced training. In Europe, the group should be associated with the U.S. forces for reasons of economy.

If these plans were accepted, the army would have to adopt the following priorities:

(1) provision of replacements for the brigade group in Korea, some 3,330 being available at present;

(2) development of a brigade group of approximately 6,000 ready for despatch to Europe by the end of October, 1951;

(3) provision, for this group, of replacements to meet non-battle wastage estimated at 8% a year;

(4) provision of men for rotation in Korea and Europe at certain dates; and,

(5) the build-up of forces in Canada.

It would be desirable to try to recruit, at about the same time, both the manpower equivalent of a brigade group for Europe and the numbers required as reinforcements and for rotation in Korea and Europe. Some 10,000 men recruited immediately, with a continuous intake at the current rate, would meet all five priorities, including 500 reinforcements a month for Korea. A brigade group should, however, not be sent to Europe unless the reinforcements that might be required in Korea were in hand.

The additional cost of providing a brigade group for Europe and reinforcements was estimated at $36 million for this year. This would be met by deferring the purchase of some U.S. tanks and certain mobilization stores.

He recommended that authority be given to raise as many men as possible for the army in order to provide for the contribution of a brigade group of about 6,000 men to the Integrated Force and for the men required as reinforcements and for rotation in Europe and Korea; that the target for sending this group be set as October or November, 1951, and that the North Atlantic Treaty Organization be informed accordingly; that no announcement, or definite international commitment, be made regarding any fixed date; and that a statement in general terms be made during the debate on the National Defence estimates that the establishment of such a force was being undertaken.

The North Atlantic Treaty Organization had enquired what forces member countries could allocate in the immediate future to the Integrated Force, under present circumstances and also in the event of a general war. A draft reply, dealing with Canadian army and air force contributions had been prepared for consideration and he recommended its approval.

An explanatory memorandum was circulated.

(Minister's memorandum, April 10, 1951 — Cab. Doc. 97-51)†

4. Mr. Claxton stated that the method of obtaining the equivalent of a brigade group for Europe and the men required for reinforcements and for rotation would be the formation of additional active units to be raised by reserve units. It would be possible to designate certain reserve units — say, an infantry unit in the Maritimes, an artillery unit in Quebec, a rifle unit in Ontario; and a highland unit in British Columbia — and appeal to all like reserve units for support in the raising of the active units. It was expected that the reserve associations would give enthusiastic support to such a scheme. An alternative under consideration was the formation of three new active regiments — highland, fusilier and rifle — and an appeal to like reserve units to provide companies for these regiments.

A "special force" would not be formed for Europe. It would be announced that the army was to be further expanded and, as at present, the appeal would be for recruits to assist in meeting Canada's United Nations and North Atlantic Treaty obligations.

5. The Minister of Labour thought that the reserve army might raise objections to the formation of new regiments. As an alternative, reserve brigades might be made responsible for raising the necessary sub-units.

6. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration suggested that formation of three new regiments might lead to the difficulty that, if the Korean war ended after their formation, Canada would, in effect, have two fairly large forces, one of which might be unemployed.

7. The Prime Minister said that it would be undesirable to make a definite commitment for the simultaneous maintenance of a brigade group in Korea and one in Europe in present circumstances. Otherwise, if insufficient recruits came forward, it would be necessary to consider a new manpower policy which would raise serious difficulties except in a general emergency. At the same time, an indication that Canada would not make any army contribution to the Integrated Force before the commitment in Korea was discharged would have an adverse effect on the development of that force. It might be desirable to recruit 6,000 men now without any definite commitment regarding Europe, so as to avoid possible embarrassment in maintaining two brigade groups. Even if the Korean war continued, however, it appeared essential to contribute some token force to the Integrated Force by the end of the year.

It was understood with the Americans that, if purchase of some tanks were deferred, they would nevertheless be available for Canada at a later date.

8. Mr. Abbott agreed that there should be no firm commitment regarding Europe for the present and considered the plan to recruit 6,000 men reasonable, partly in view of the fact that some members of the Special Force would only be serving for a total of eighteen months.

9. The Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out that, while there was an undertaking to have a Canadian force available for Korea or elsewhere in the interests of the United Nations, there was no firm commitment to allocate a Canadian army formation to the Integrated Force before July, 1954. Difficulties lay ahead. One was that NATO was considering the question of expediting allocations of forces to the Integrated Force. Again, once a start was made on recruiting new units, it would be considered that these were being raised for Europe. There would, therefore, be pressure for statements as to progress in developing an army formation for Europe. This could lead to serious embarrassment as he was not too optimistic about the possibility of raising by present methods all the men now proposed.

He agreed that it was necessary to send at least a token force to Europe before the end of the year and considered that the 25th Infantry Brigade should be withdrawn from Korea just as soon as this proved feasible. If the war ended in Korea, it should not be required to remain there during the period of reorganization. It should, rather, be the responsibility of the eastern countries to provide forces during that period.

10. Mr. Harris believed that, in the interests of obtaining as many recruits as possible, it would be preferable to enlist the additional men proposed by the Minister of National Defence for a period of eighteen months rather than the normal three years.

11. The Cabinet, after further discussion, noting the proposals of the Minister of National Defence regarding Canadian army and air force contributions to the Integrated Force and Korea, agreed that:

(a) the Department of National Defence take steps to raise for the army as many men as possible, through the reserves, in order to provide an additional brigade group or regimental combat team of about 6,000 officers and men, together with the officers and men required as reinforcements and for rotation in Korea and Europe, against the possibility of the government deciding at a future date to send an army formation to the Integrated Force; the department to bear in mind the possible desirability of eighteen-month enlistments to facilitate recruitment of these men;

(b) it would be desirable to contribute at least a token army formation to the Integrated Force by the end of 1951; the feasibility of such a course to be considered further at the appropriate time;[14]

(c) the aim should be to have the brigade group sufficiently prepared by October or November, 1951 to permit its despatch to the Integrated Force, if desired;

(d) no announcement or commitment should be made regarding any definite date for the preparation and despatch of an army formation to the Integrated Force;

(e) an announcement would be made in the House of Commons that it was proposed further to expand the army by the formation of additional units and that there was still the intention to contribute a brigade group to the Integrated Force when circumstances permit;

(f) the proposed reply to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization enquiry regarding the timing of allocations or army and air force contributions to the Integrated Force was satisfactory provided: section (1)(a) were amended to indicate that provision of a brigade group to the Integrated Force would depend on events in Korea; section (1)(b) were revised to indicate that the first three Canadian squadrons in the United Kingdom would be available for the Integrated Force in 1953 rather than 1952; and the last sentence of section (2)(a), referring to four divisions in training during the year following D-Day, were deleted; and,

(g) it would be desirable for the 25th Infantry Brigade to be withdrawn from Korea at the earliest suitable opportunity.

FUTURE POLICY REGARDING CANADIAN MUTUAL AID

1. As Canadian mutual aid funds have now been fully earmarked or committed, a stage has been reached where there is a general need for consideration of future Canadian policy regarding mutual aid. Moreover, as Mr. H.R. MacMillan will next week be taking up his duties as Canadian member of the NATO Defence Production Board, there is an urgent need for decisions to serve as a basis for instructions to him regarding Canadian participation in the defence production programme of that Board. In the circumstances, the Panel on Economic Aspects of Defence Questions has been giving consideration to these matters.

2. Under the Defence Appropriation Act of September, 1950, $300 million were appropriated for the following purposes:

"(a) The production, acquisition, repair and provision of equipment, services, supplies and facilities for the naval, army and air Services of the Canadian forces and the armed forces of any party to the North Atlantic Treaty, and the construction, improvement and repair of facilities, and the acquisition, processing and storage of materials, supplies and equipment, required to produce or otherwise make available as, where and when required, any such equipment, supplies, services or facilities.

(b) The transfer of Defence equipment or supplies and the provision of services or facilities for defence purposes, by Canada to any of the parties to the North Atlantic Treaty. The estimated present value of such equipment or supplies shall be charged to this appropriation and a corresponding amount shall be paid into a special account in the Consolidated Revenue Fund which may be used at any time to purchase equipment or supplies for the naval, army or air services of the Canadian services."

3. A further $61,383,108 have been included in the National Defence estimates for 1951-52 to be used for similar purposes.

4. These funds, totalling $361,383,108, have been earmarked or committed as follows:
